THE Rev. H. J. Rossington, Ardeevin, Cadogan Park, Belfast, writes as follows: "From time to time soldiers from our English churches have been sent to Irish camps or hospitals. When such cases were known to our ministers the latter have been prompt to pay visits to the men. But it is possible that not all were notified. To avoid any neglect in future I shall be glad to receive directly from our English ministers particulars concerning arrivals in this country. Should distance prevent my personal visitation I can promise on behalf of my fellow-ministers that they will be most ready to look up any men located in their particular district."

THE American Unitarian Association cordially acknowledges a parcel of our S.S.A.'s books, and in return send some of their own, which are now placed in the Teachers' Reference Library of Essex Hall, and may be borrowed on application to Mr. Hare.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—Whatever the military end of the war may be, we shall count it lost unless after it a League of Nations replaces the old, bad system of a Balance of Power and competing armaments. And we are surely all agreed that a League of Nations that excluded Germany would be as good as none. In last week's INQUIRER I see you welcome the suggestion that has recently been made of a League of the Allies made here and now as a preliminary to a General League after the war. But would not such a step go far to prejudice the chance of any effective League at all? A League of Allies that must at present exclude neutrals (if they are not to forfeit their neutrality), as well as enemy countries, would not look very different from the present war alliance of the Entente Powers. And remembering that war, in Mr. J. A. Hobson's phrase, "is an atmosphere of insane suspicion," we could hardly be surprised if the Central Empires subsequently declined our invitation to come in. And might they not possibly retaliate by forming a League of the Central Powers, and so bring us back at a swing to the pre-war peace condition of the two armed camps of Europe?

If we really want a League of Nations that will make for peace and not for war do not let us wreck it at the start. Let us do what we can to make it likely that Germany will come in. And in order to do that must we not all start fair, and should not the formation of the League be left to be an integral part of the terms of a peace settlement, when the burning question of the economic boycott as well as the question of disarmament, which are vital to the League, could be faced anew together?—Yours, &c., JANET CASE.

DENT'S 'MEDICAL DICTIONARY.'

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—I do not much admire what is known as "answering back," but I would like to reply to one or two statements made by Dr. J. L. Tayler in his review of my 'Medical Dictionary' (INQUIRER, June 15). He says: "Botulism is explained (!) with the two words 'sausage poisoning,' and this is both laconic and inaccurate." Now, botulism is not explained. The word is defined, which is a different thing, and the definition is both terse and accurate. The word is derived from Latin botulus, a sausage; and botulism means sausage poisoning, just as "alcoholism" means alcoholic poisoning, and "plumbism" means lead poisoning. The best medical dictionary to which I have access (Dorland's) gives "Botulism—sausage poisoning, allantiasis." The 'New Standard Dictionary' gives "poisoning by decomposed sausages." The word is not given in 'Murray's Dictionary' nor in the 'Century Dictionary.' I think the authorities quoted are more likely to be correct than the daily papers which have recently been using the word in a wider sense. Again, Dr. Tayler says "'Infant Feeding' does not explain why the natural method is so superior." The article is a fairly long one (over nine columns), but the intelligent reader will have no difficulty in discovering at least twelve reasons why. There are other points, but you ask correspondents to be brief.—Yours, &c.,

W. B. DRUMMOND.

A BIOGRAPHY OF DR. HUNTER.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—It is intended to produce a short biography of the late Rev. Dr. John Hunter. I should be grateful if any who possess letters from him or other relevant material would allow me to see them. They would be carefully handled and returned. I should also be glad if any who knew him in his early days in Aberdeen or at college or were acquainted with his work in York and Hull would write to me.—Yours, &c., L. S. HUNTER.

THE LATE DR. DRUMMOND.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—Will you kindly allow me, on behalf of my mother and the members of her family, to thank the numerous friends who have sent us messages of sympathy. The generous and affectionate tributes to my father's life and work and the words of personal love and sympathy have touched us very deeply, and helped us almost to forget our own sorrow in thankfulness for God's wonderful gift.—Yours, &c., WM. H. DRUMMOND.

OUR SOLDIERS AND SAILORS.

THE number of soldiers and sailors whose names and addresses have been sent to Lawrence House continues to grow. The new Bulletin goes out this week to 6,674 officers and men. The list of killed has grown to 750 and another 41 are reported missing, while 68 are known to be prisoners of war. This makes a total of 7,533 whose names are registered at Lawrence House as having joined the army or the navy from amongst the members of our churches and schools. Yet we know the list is incomplete because several congregations have not supplied any list of names. It may be of interest to add that to every soldier or sailor whose name is received for the first time at Essex Hall a copy of the little booklet 'For Freedom and Right' is posted. This booklet has met with a warm welcome, and so many men outside our own community have asked for it that the number disposed of has reached 10,000 and the question of reprinting it has become urgent. A copy of Robert Collyer's 'Letter to a Sick Soldier,' to which attention has already been directed in our columns, is forwarded to men in hospital whose names are sent to Essex Hall.

SOUTHERN PROVINCIAL ASSEMBLY

AT a recent meeting of the Committee a letter was read from the Minister of the Assembly, the Rev. W. H. Drummond, asking for leave of absence for the duration of the war in order to continue his work with the army in France, and offering his resignation as an alternative. After considering the letter the Committee decided that it could not grant leave of absence for such a long period and accepted his resignation with regret. Mr. Drummond has held the office of Minister to the Assembly for nine years.

FOUR sermons on Moral Problems which were recently delivered by Miss Maude Royden at the City Temple, including 'Christianity and the Marriage Laws,' are being issued as penny pamphlets by The Christian Commonwealth, Salisbury Square, W.C.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Belfast.—The Anniversary Services at All Souls' Church, on Sunday, June 16, were made notable by the visit of the Rev. Dr. Estlin Carpenter, who preached in the morning and afternoon. After morning service, Holy Communion was celebrated, when seven new adult and seven new junior members were welcomed into membership of the Church by the minister, the Rev. E. H. Pickering. They were also welcomed into the membership of the Non-Subscribing Presbyterian Church of Ireland by the ex-Moderator, the Rev. H. J. Rossington, and into the larger fellowship of the Liberal Christian Churches by Dr. Carpenter. At both services, when Dr. Carpenter preached, the church was filled with representative congregations. In the morning he took for his text the words "Worship in spirit and in truth," and in the afternoon his subject was 'Christianity in the Light of Other Religions.' What made Christianity of unique and profound value for all mankind, said Dr. Carpenter, was our Lord's teaching of the kingdom of God, which was conceived not as merely personal salvation but as the renewal of the whole social order—the rule of God by spirit, which meant an end to merely formal worship; by light, which meant no more despondency, darkness, and mistrust; by righteousness, no more injustice, oppression, and greed; by love, an end of cruelty and tyrannic power, and war. Jesus was a supreme optimist in that to simple working folk and ordinary everyday people he issued the magnificent summons, "Be ye perfect as your Father in heaven is perfect." At the evening service the Minister preached to a good congregation. The day's collections were part of an effort to wipe off a debt incurred by war conditions, and, with subscriptions, amounted to £126.—One of the members of the church, Staff-Capt. Hewitt Stitt, who has already received the Military Cross, has lately received the D.S.O., and been appointed liaison officer to a division of the American Army.

Blackfriars Mission and Stamford Street Chapel.—The first of what it is hoped may be a series of Musical Services was held on Sunday evening, June 16. There was a good attendance in spite of unfavourable weather, and the congregation greatly appreciated the singing of the Misses Kent, who kindly visited the Mission to assist in the service. Mr. Stephenson's addresses awaken much interest, and the committee have great confidence in the future of the Mission under his leadership.

Exeter Assembly.—The assembly of this ancient society of Devon Divines was held at George's Meeting, Exeter, on June 19, the Rev. T. B. Evans, of Sidmouth, the Moderator, presiding. There were also present the Revs. F. Allen (Newton Abbot), T. F. M. Brockway (Moretonhampstead), C. E. Jewell (Crediton), A. Lancaster (Tavistock), E. Palmer (Uffculme), J. Worthington (Torquay), and W. H. Burgess (Plymouth), scribe to the Assembly. The Rev. Donald B. Fraser was elected a member and heartily welcomed. A resolution expressing grateful appreciation of the life and labours of the late Jeffery Worthington, of Cullompton, senior member of the Assembly, was passed. The following resolutions on public questions were adopted: (a) The members of the Exeter Assembly welcome the proposals for establishing a Federal University for the south-west of England with constituent colleges in the principal towns, and resolve to do all in their power to make University teaching more accessible to the people of the district. (b) This Assembly advocates the formation of a League of Nations to secure the reference of disputes between States to arbitration and for the more sure maintenance of world-peace. The latter resolution was forwarded to the Prime Minister and has been acknowledged. The Rev. Joseph Worthington opened a discussion on the question as to whether the Assembly could be made of more service to our Devon churches. He suggested the admission of elected lay representatives and the organisation of finances on the lines of the Non-Subscribing Presbyterian Church of Ireland. The members adjourned for lunch to the Clarence Hotel. In the afternoon they were entertained to tea by ladies of the Exeter congregation. Afterwards opportunity was taken of bidding farewell to the Rev. A. Lancaster, who is retiring from the active ministry after many years' service in Devon. The Rev. C. E. Jewell, the Rev. T. Brockway and Mr. Eric Lemmon expressed the good wishes of the company to him for his future welfare. The Exeter friends were warmly thanked for their hospitality. The Rev. Joseph Worthington was elected Moderator for the ensuing year.

Gainsborough.—The Sunday School Anniversary Services were held last Sunday in connection with Beaumont Street Church, when the congregation filled the old meeting house. The minister, the Rev. W. R. Clark-Lewis, conducted the afternoon service, and Mr. W. Green the evening one. Several musical items and recitations were given by the scholars. The Minister read a letter from one of the men serving in France, who had sent with it his subscription to the school. In the course of the letter he said that when he told the Sergeant he was a Unitarian, the latter was puzzled to know what to do with him. The writer said that he was surprised how little the Unitarian movement was understood, and that he thought much good could be done if a campaign could be undertaken in Britain to give away our literature. He hoped on his return to take a share in the work of making the faith better known.

Holywood: Co. Down.—On Saturday, June 15, a Sale of Work was held in the Town Hall on behalf of the Music Fund. Dr. J. Estlin Carpenter presided at the opening, and Mrs. Kelly, of Dunmurry, declared the sale open. The result has been a balance of £206 2s. 10d., an increase of more than £20 on the last sale in pre-war days.

Newcastle-on-Tyne.—The Military Cross with a Bar has been awarded to Second Lieut. Lionel Robinson. This is the fourth Military Cross to be awarded to officers who are closely associated with the Church of the Divine Unity. Second Lieut. Robinson was recently made a prisoner while holding an outpost. Unfortunately, no further news has been received concerning Capt. C. N. Levin, M.C., the son of Mr. Otto Levin, J.P., who has been missing since March 21.—Successful Sunday school Anniversary Services were conducted by one of the Church members, Mr. Herbert Clarke M.A., B.Sc., on Sunday, June 16.

Newport, I.W.—The services at the Unitarian Church on June 16 and 23 were conducted by the Rev. W. J. Pond, of Stannington. In the morning, on June 23, Mr. Pond made appropriate reference to the sudden and tragic death of Dr. Hargrove, emphasising the fact that Dr. Hargrove conducted his last religious service and preached his last sermon in that pulpit on June 9. At the close the congregation stood in silence as an expression of their reverence for Dr. Hargrove's memory.

Newton Abbot.—On Sunday evening, the 23rd inst., the service at the Unitarian Church was conducted by Mr. P. Townsend, a local Congregationalist, to enable the Rev. Frederic Allen to accept an invitation to take the service in Union Chapel, Highweek village. The subject taken by Mr. Allen was 'A Question of To-day: Is Religion of any Use?' We understand that in both cases the exchange was appreciated.

North and East Lancashire Mission.—At its June meeting held in Bolton on the 19th, the chairman, the Rev. J. J. Wright, presiding, the North and East Lancashire Unitarian Mission by resolution guaranteed a continuance of its grants to any of its grant-aided churches where the minister, with the consent of his congregation, was desirous of putting in a term of National Service, and felt assured that the older ministers in the respective districts would willingly attend to all pastoral duties in the absence of the younger ministers either of the aided or self-supporting churches within the Mission area. The Mission also agreed to give again the war bonus to its ministers on the same conditions as last year.

Mexborough.—On Sunday, June 16, the Sunday School Anniversary Services were held. Mr. W. Tayler, of Doncaster, conducted the afternoon service, and the minister, the Rev. T. Anderson, preached in the evening, when the church was crowded. Special music was rendered by the College and choir.

Shrewsbury.—The 128th Sunday School Anniversary Services were held on June 16. The special preacher was the Rev. W. G. Topping of Coseley, whose sermons, morning and evening, dealt with the training of the young, and the aims and ideals which those engaged in this work should set before themselves. Mr. Topping also gave the address at the afternoon service, in which the scholars from Swan Hill Congregational Church joined. At all the services the children sang appropriate hymns, in which they had been efficiently trained by the organist, Mrs. Roberts.

NOTES OF THE WEEK:

All letters and manuscripts for the Editor should be sent to 13 Bream's Buildings, Fetter Lane, London, E.C.4. They must reach the Editor not later than Wednesday morning for publication the same week.

THANKS are tendered to the many friends of this journal who have promptly forwarded the addition asked for in the amount of their subscription for the present year. The managers confidently trust that, amid all the changes involved, the sympathy and support hitherto given in these difficult times will be generously continued, and that THE INQUIRER may still make a real contribution to the advance of religious thought and the uplifting of the whole life of the community.

* * *

THAT nations may in time learn much is made strikingly clear in the combined celebrations of Independence Day, with the spirit of which we all cordially concur. Let us all try to catch more, at the present time, of the American passion for democracy; we shall need it if we are to be really united, for the world's good, with the mighty Republic of the West. We note that the President Emeritus of Harvard University and our distinguished brother in the faith, Dr. G. W. Eliot, has once again voiced the warm friendship of leaders in the United States for our country. Lord Reading, upon whom the University was conferring an honorary degree, delivered a notable speech in which he said: "Believing as we do and as you do, that we are animated in all our aims and purposes by the same faith in our fellow men, in the justice and in the liberties of our fellow men, in the worship of God and in the preservation of the spirit of pure and cleanly lives; and having, as I verily believe, raised or helped to raise among the Allies the ideals of men, let us combine to keep them there, and ever continue to raise these ideals even higher, so that in the end we may be joined together."

DR. ELIOT, who was insistently called for by the audience, said: "Perhaps

I know what you want me to say. Lord Reading, we all feel, and most thinking Americans feel, the truth of what you have been saying about the permanent union of all English-speaking peoples for the preservation of liberty and justice in the world. To my thinking that would be an adequate outcome of this fearful war, which will not have been fought in vain if it leads to the creation of a firm union among the English-speaking peoples for the maintenance of the principles that Lord Reading has just laid down. We, however, are glad to welcome other democracies of the world. May I express to Lord Reading the sincere hope of us all that he will be able to promote the immediate execution of an alliance, defensive and offensive, between Great Britain and the United States. Some of our people are holding back on the creation of such an alliance which shall not only bring the war to a victorious conclusion but last centuries beyond—a union which shall promote effectively freedom and justice in the world."

* * *

THE generous offer reported by Dr. Jacks in his letter on another page should meet with a prompt and eager response. Ministers desiring to take the chance now presented of a short period of residence and study at Oxford need hardly be reminded that the accommodation is necessarily limited and the sooner they send in application to be enrolled the better. Perhaps we may be so bold as to suggest that, going to the academical centre from their scenes of practical ministry they may not only gain much themselves in being brought abreast of the later scholarship, but may give valuable help in the way of indicating the best lines of College reform, a subject now to the fore.

LORD RHONDDA's story is that of an energetic man whose faculties had been well cultivated and whose convictions were deep. He made no pretension to any specially noble principles; indeed one occasion at least found him bluntly declaring that his gospel was that of doing good to others so long as it included good to yourself. The business side of his career was, like that of most capitalists, chequered by some stiff bouts with opponents; but in no case could it be more aptly said than of him, finis coronat. As Food Controller he attained a success which has been widely acknowledged, and which all other officials of the kind in Europe failed to reach. His record is that of a true citizen, content to throw all his might into public service.

* * *

WE get an interesting bit of self-revelation by Professor Huxley in Mrs. Humphry Ward's 'Recollections,' a further instalment of which appears in this month's Cornhill. She had commended certain works to her friend's notice, and in the course of his reply, he said: "...As a rule 'Philosophies of Religion,' in my experience, turn out to be only 'Religions of Philosophers'—quite another business, as you will admit. And if you please, Ma'am, I wish to add that I think I am not without sympathy for Christian feeling—or rather for what you mean by it. Beneath the cooled logical upper strata of my microcosm, there is a fused mass of prophetism and mysticism, and the Lord knows what might happen to me, in case a moral earthquake cracked the superincumbent deposit, and permitted an eruption of the demonic element below.... Luckily I am near 70, and not a G.O.M.—so the danger is slight. One must stick to one's trade. It is my business to the best of my ability to fight for scientific clearness—that is what the world lacks. Feeling, Christian or other, is superabundant...."

* * *

DR. JOWETT, now in England again, has told an Observer interviewer something of his impressions and hopes concerning the Americans among whom he has lived for seven busy years. He points out that there is an 'American nimbleness of mind' which contrasts with 'English reserve,' but "there are no differences in the basic honesty of the two peoples." They need "patience" with us, we "tolerance" with them. He thinks they have emphasised of late chiefly the sociological implications of theology and church work; in England the emphasis has been on individual and personal aspects of religion. Both types of teaching are needed, "merged into a common message." Dr. Jowett has great expectations in regard to the Anglo-American University which it is proposed to build in 1920, to commemorate the Pilgrim Fathers; and he has whole-hearted faith in the American purpose to purify international relationships all over the world.

* * *

THE death of Mr. J. Allen Baker will be much regretted, and by no one more than those Unitarians who had the privilege of working with him in connection with social and international welfare. His Quaker position admirably enabled him to bring together men of different religious bodies into harmonious co-operation. Shrewd in business, a great traveller, practical and kind-hearted, he was probably one of the most really Christian-minded of politicians and public workers. His ideals included an educated working class and a brotherhood inclusive of the whole world. The war crashed through some of the peace machinery he had toiled to create, but in this as in other scenes of ruin there will be upbuilding, new and larger, by and by.

* * *

IN a review of Dr. Drummond's two volumes of New Testament studies entitled 'The Way of Life' The Aberdeen Free Press says: "They are marked by all the clarity, the literary grace, the deep insight, the lofty thought and noble passion which distinguished Dr. Drummond's religious utterances; they are the work of one who though a scholar and a thinker kept in close contact with the world of actuality and eschewed the purely cloistered attitude of mind. Dr. Drummond was an earnest and fearless champion of religious freedom, and his study of the New Testament was untrammelled by any preconceptions or conventions. His outlook was essentially modern and free, and in these notable sermons one finds everywhere the fruits of a wide culture and a high tolerance. There is little here of the narrow denominationalism which one associates with purely sectarian controversy or propaganda. Hence the wide appeal which the studies make. There is no class of churchmen to whom their perusal will not bring intellectual and spiritual uplift and general benefit."

* * *

LAST Sunday, according to the Rev. Sidney M. Berry, minister of Carr's Lane Congregational Church, Birmingham, should be a memorable date, for it was the first time for many centuries that a bishop of the Church of England had preached from a Nonconformist pulpit. The bishop, who could it be but Dr. Henson of Hereford! He took occasion to point out that the present denominational systems were obsolete, that a large measure of unrecognised agreement and co-operation already exists, and that there is a deep and growing discontent with the discord that still persists. He suggested there should be an honest and searching review by all the Churches of their inherited systems, with the object of casting aside whatever had become unreal and valueless.

IDEALISTS STILL.

I MET a lady a while ago, who remarked, "Sometimes I am glad my husband died before the war. He was an Idealist, and the war would have broken his heart." This was embarrassing for me. In a modest way, I have counted myself an Idealist. And I was not dead. I was not wearing any manifestly broken heart upon my sleeve. I suggested meekly that in the Idealist's reading-book, the first lesson is to keep his heart unbroken as long as there is breath in his body. But she changed the conversation. Or was it not a change in the conversation? What she said was, "It is surprising how callous some people are in this world-agony." I fear I was written down by her as another of the callous.

This is not pleasant. The Idealist gets smitten on both cheeks. Because he hates war and hopes to see it abolished, he is cuffed for a weak-headed sentimentalist. Because he goes on breathing when there is blood abroad, he is cuffed for callousness. The charge of being weak-headed is the easier to endure. He knows that if a dozen Idealists had been in charge of Europe for the last few years, they could not have made such a shipwreck of its fortunes as the hard-headed men who have placed us so terribly upon the rocks. But to be charged with hard-heartedness really grieves him. When Job was scraping himself with the potsherd among the ashes, it was not the boils that hurt him most. It was the group of neighbours hanging about the doors of his tent waiting to see him curse God and die. They thought that boils and ashes were a clear refutation of Idealism.

What I understand by an Idealist is a man who believes in the coming of the Kingdom of God on earth, and who "carries on" whether the sun is shining or the night is dark. He is a man who believes that the souls of men are the most important fact in the history of this planet. He believes that the sentiments of the soul are greater wisdom than the prudences of the market-places. He hopes to see statecraft governed by the sentiments of the soul. He believes that Justice and Love are feasible principles for commerce and for government, and that the real wealth of a nation is the spiritual territory it shares and uses. He believes the Good Samaritan was a greater genius in the art of life than Cæsar or Napoleon. He believes that all men privately revere the sentiments of the soul. He believes that it is his business to agitate such thoughts; to elicit them from their slumbering places; to reform and transform traditions, customs and interests under their illumination; to persuade men that moral force can move mountains; to plead with them to drive incessantly at practice under their inspiration. The Idealist's commission is made out on those terms.

But in that commission, there was no specification of the date when the Kingdom is to come. He signed on for the duration of the war; and his war did not begin in 1914, and will not end with the victory of the Allies. Likewise, in that commission, there was no contract that there would be no Armageddon. When he signed on, years ago, it may not have entered his calculations that he would have any worse foes to fight than the apathy of men; their vested interests; their love of possessions and of idleness; their want of sympathy and imagination. But his commission was not withdrawn because Armageddon came, and the passions and the tortures of armed conflict made his world still darker.

The Idealists who have broken down have been under a misapprehension of the terms of their commission. It would seem that Jacob was their father; "If God will be with me, and will keep me in this way that I go, and will give me bread to eat, and raiment to put on, so that I come to my father's house in peace, then shall the Lord be my God." The broken-down Idealists said, "We are willing to work for the Kingdom in the mild ways of propagating ideas; the forming of societies; the altering of laws; the spread of education; the redistribution of wealth; the reorganisation of the Church." And they did gallant service in those ways. But they have not survived the disappointment the war brought them about the date of the coming of the Kingdom, and about the conditions that now exist.

They must surely be amongst the unhappiest men of these unhappy times. Their speech bewrays them. They write to us others of "your war." They quiver at the daily tale of blood, and hold it a duty to quiver more sensitively if the blood is German than if it is English. They say that there is nothing to choose between the two sides; that it is six of one and half-a-dozen of the other. They devise palliations of enemy cruelties, but have only fierce reprobation for our own. They make the monstrous charge that the atrocities on both sides are probably equal, and tell us not to dwell on what happened in Belgium because it will offend the Germans. They are distraught. They cannot any more distinguish good from evil. They are guilty of the unforgivable sin in the soldier—cowardice in the face of the enemy.

In the early days of Armageddon, when the declared Idealists were staggering under the realisation of what their commission involved, they were much instructed by the conduct of men they knew. Those men had not ever said much about Idealism; but they quietly took up its burden and faced all its sacrifices. Young men, mostly; not all. They were lovely and pleasant in their lives, and in their deaths they were not divided. They were raped from the tasks and ambitions of peace by the summons of the Ideal, speaking in them as pity for suffering Belgium, and holy indignation against the insolence and cruelty of barbaric Might. They went through bitterness of soul; perhaps at facing the probability of being killed; certainly at facing the necessity of killing. We learned much from them; and more when we wept for their bodies broken by the war. Others, passing on to the same ordeals, have ratified their instruction. We weep for them with tears that can never dry, praying the while that their heroism and self-sacrifice may be echoed in our faithfulness to our own commission.

The sufferings and hardships of the conflict alter by no jot or tittle the facts and articles of the Idealist's faith. Really, he did not live in a fool's paradise before the war. He did not imagine that civilisation was satisfactory, needing only a few judicious, painless alterations in the incidence of taxation. In those days he was always pouring scorn on those who boasted of progress, and who exulted in the triumphs of invention and discovery, and who trusted in science to save humanity with telegraphs and torpedoes, serums and submarines. He lived each day amid the sins and the sorrows of cities, and daily saw men's lives squandered in the bloodless but bitter conflicts of peace. But he always remembered that humanity was but at the beginning of its history; that it was but as yesterday that it emerged from the cave and the jungle. What kept surprising him was not that the habits and manners of cave thinking and jungle thinking clung to us still. Again and again he was thrilled to find how much justice, heroism and unselfishness had developed in Caliban's children.

And he was never able to picture life otherwise than as a conflict. He gave up talking much about heaven, because he was unable to conceive of beatitude in a world where there was no sin and death to fight and conquer. And in his daily experience, no principle was oftener or more surprisingly vindicated than that there is a soul of goodness in things evil, would men observingly distil it out. He does not like to say much about this principle at the present time, lest he should seem to be in the company of those who say that war is a blessing in disguise. But the principle is true all the same. In those days, the proofs of it came straggling, one by one. In these days they come in battalions. You cannot tell a story of horror out of this war but he can tell you two of the blinding beauty of moral courage; or of pity, self-sacrificial unto death. Show him the victories of force; he will show you at once the seeds of decay and collapse already sending forth vigorous shoots beneath them. There is no place where the Destroyer is at work where the Redeemer is not hurrying to the rescue.

But the immensity of the struggle? There has never been so great a conflict in the vexed history of the earth. It staggers comprehension and apprehension. Yes. So will the resulting peace. Wars have been local and temporal; their lessons have been local and temporal. This war is not just another of the old pattern. Now all the world's life is concentrated on half-a-dozen principles of morality. All the world is now disciple in the elementary principles by which peoples are to live together on the earth. All the other wars have been incidental skirmishes; questions of crowns and frontiers. The Idealist has had his troubles in explaining God in history. They have gone. Now it seems to him as if he were standing at a decisive stage in the drama of the world's childhood; as if all the Wars that have ever been, the processions of empires, the spread of commerce, the march of invention, the conquest of the air are all fragments that fall into their proper place now to bring the whole world together into one kingdom and to one morality and to one God. It is as if the great Power that has spoken unto the fathers by diverse portions and in divers manners, has now brought them all together in one sharp crisis for the world-vindication of the nature of Right, and the making of a freedom in which it can enter at last upon its great inheritance.

Another thing in his daily experience was that there is below the surface of things a mysterious transforming remedial power; by virtue of which the values that time throws up are not merely conserved, but augmented. He reckons that the devastated earth will by and by be bringing forth seed to the sower and bread to the eater. He thinks that the torments of brains in these days will multiply the world's power of knowing and understanding what truth and virtue essentially are. Old scriptures are being at last understood. New Scriptures are forming.

But the dead are dead? The Idealist never believed it, except in the hours when terrestrial habits of thinking seduced his understanding. In his better mind he knew that nothing human ever dies. When the Idealist mourns for the fallen, it is their bodily presence that he misses. He never dreams their souls have perished because their bodies are decaying below the blood-stained earth or in the wandering seas. So he and his like remain Idealists still, whether the sun be shining or the night be dark.

J. H. WEATHERALL.

"MISSING."

UNDER this sinister heading the following entry occurs in The Times Roll of Honour, June 19 last:—

I wonder how many Unitarians recognised in this notice the case of one of their ministers serving for conscience sake? We all deeply hope that the Rev. Percival Godding, the respected minister of Ballyclare, is a prisoner of war and not irrevocably missing. It is years since I last saw him, but sharing the same house and board for a fortnight I got experience of a peculiarly loveable and modest personality. He was quick in service and sympathy, often anticipating the wants of his fellow-guests. His joining the army was all of a piece with this, and there is no doubt his men would discover in him a fine example. To Mrs. Godding and his congregation the deepest sympathy will be extended.

OUR ROLL OF HONOUR.

FURTHER additions and corrections have been received from the Rev. G. L. Phelps, Holywood; Miss K. M. Potter, Willaston School; the Rev. H. Shaen Solly, Parkstone; and Mrs. Bartram, London.

THE LATE DR. HARGROVE.

CHARLES HARGROVE was born in Clapton, in the North of London, on July 4, 1840. His father had been a clergyman of the Church of England, but had joined in 1837 the community known as the Plymouth Brethren, founded about seven years earlier. The movement appeared at first to be founded in a Faith and Love that ignored ecclesiastical distinctions, and set the Spirit above the Sacrament. It attracted for a time even such a mind as Francis Newman's. But it quickly settled down into the narrowest Calvinistic orthodoxy, and the Bible became practically the object of its worship, the author and finisher of its faith. Writing of his early childhood, in a profoundly interesting fragment of autobiography, he says: "Our religion was mainly Bibliolatry, the worship of the Bible as the Word of God. As soon as we learnt to read a copy was given to each of us; and as we grew up we took it with us wherever we went.... I remember well the feeling of doing something wicked and perilous when I ventured for the first time—but that was years afterwards—to go somewhere without one."

When Charles was two years old his mother had a serious illness and he was sent away with the nurse to her home in Hereford. After five years he was taken back to the family home which had been removed to St. John's Wood. Here the child, naturally nervous and timid, lived in a religious atmosphere of extreme Calvinism, with the terror of his sins, and the torments of the lost constantly in his mind. One day when the sky was overcast and dark he saw a rift in the cloud and the light beginning to break through, and he gazed in terror expecting to see the Christ coming in the clouds of heaven to judge the earth.

Of his school days at Wimbledon there is little to say. It was a good school, with a good Scotch headmaster, one George Murray. That he should have a happy school life there, or anywhere else, was impossible. There is a touching letter to his father written when he was eleven years old, saying how four of the boys had "made their escape from school and been brought back at half-past three in the morning by a policeman," and going on to speak of his own unhappiness, crying out "What shall I do to be saved?" He knows the Scriptural answer well enough; but asks "How am I to believe?" "What is belief?" and ends with a postscript: "My feelings very much correspond with Romans vii. 18-25." Strange feelings indeed and unnatural for a school-boy; but all this experience was not in vain. It was part of the great struggle for a life the fulness and richness of which more than compensated for the early pain and fear.

From Wimbledon he went to University College, London, but returned to his old school to prepare for Cambridge. He obtained a scholarship and entered Emmanuel College. At Cambridge he took an active interest in the theological and ecclesiastical controversies of the day, was attracted by the life and character, no less than the religion, of the Oratorians; and after leaving the University he became an inmate for a time of what is now the Brompton Oratory, accepted a post as teacher at Oscott, determined to enter the order of St. Dominic, and after a year's noviciate and taking the vows and five years' further study in Rome and France he was ordained priest at Avignon in 1869.

The passage from Evangelical Protestantism to the Church of Rome can never in itself involve any great mental or spiritual agony. It is a finding of repose, and the convert is received everywhere with a warm welcome untouched by any suspicion or doubts. But to a tender and affectionate nature such as Charles Hargrove's the grief which the step he was taking caused to his parents and friends was a bitter grief to himself also. For their sakes he would have held back if he could; but he could not. He believed that this was the true Church. He accepted her teaching and authority and he must give himself to her. After taking the vows of the Order he had chosen to enter, "Joyfully I laid myself down that night," he wrote many years after, "I felt that I belonged to Dominic our Father, to Mary and to God. On the morrow I began my five years of theological study."

His letters written at this time testify to his filial affection and his desire to enable his parents and his brother to understand. There is no condemnation of that which he leaves, only appreciation of that which he has gained. And afterwards when the time came for him to leave the Roman Communion, there was no word of bitterness or hostility to that Church from him. He always continued to appreciate all that was greatest and best in her, and to keep up so far as possible his old friendships. On the news of his death letters of kindly sympathy came from the present master of his old school, from an old college friend now a country vicar, and from the Prior of St. Dominic's in London.

He now found not rest, for there is little rest for the true servant of God in this world, but strength and peace, in the Roman Catholic Church, which has departed in many ways so far from the Christian ideal, but which offers to the poor dweller in a hovel or a city slum all the majesty and glory of High Mass in a cathedral on some great festival; and, on the other hand, to him who is weary of the world a bare cell and a pallet bed, and communion with the saints of God. He loved the Church in her greatness and grandeur and the simple monastic life. He would go back from his duties in the world or the performance of mass to his little cell in the monastery and kneel down and kiss the floor. And when recently I referred to one who had been a priest of the Roman Catholic Church and had left it, and had joined a Protestant community, and who declared that he felt no wrench or strain in doing so—adding that it seemed difficult to understand—he replied: "The man who feels no wrench and no pain when he leaves the Church of Rome has never been in it."

But that pain also had to come to him. I have said that he was a timid child; but he was never afraid of the truth, or of his duty. When he was in the West Indies, and found some habitual neglect in regard to details of the various offices and other matters, and was told "Oh! we don't say that," or "We don't do that here," he would reply: "But it is ordered and I must do it." He never paltered with questions either of ritual or of dogma. In recent years he would smile not unkindly, but with some sense of amusement, at the way in which an Anglican clergyman can say "I don't go so far as so and so," &c., "I accept," or "I don't accept," this or that statement; while still remaining in the Church, and being in fact a very good Churchman. There was no such possibility for him. He must go just so far as the Church authorised him to go and must accept with unquestioning submission the whole doctrine and ritual or relinquish it.

Now in the exercise of his duties as a priest in Trinidad, he had to visit the sick and dying in the hospital; there he saw much, not only of those of his own Church, but also of others of divers Churches and of no Church, of divers nations and of no nation, of all sorts and conditions of men. And Trinidad was visited by one of those terrible pestilences of which we can form little idea in our moderate climate. Smallpox carried off its hundreds of victims day after day. And he knew that he was bound to believe that the heretics and outcasts, whether men, women, or little children, who were dying there, and all others like unto them, would perish everlastingly, and only the true Catholics be saved. But it was an intolerable burden of grief to him, and he thought about it, and questioned it, and sought a truthful answer to the question "Do I really believe this?" And one day as he gazed out of the window into the light of heaven he answered the questioning of his own soul and cried aloud: "I do not believe it. It is not true."

And then he knew that he had ceased to be a member of the Order of St. Dominic, ceased to be a priest of the Roman Catholic Church. It was not a matter on which to consult his Superior. He had only to inform him of the fact.

For two years, 1874-76, he could not see his way to any definite religious work. His position was clear enough in his own mind, but there was no denomination he could associate himself with. He occupied himself chiefly in lecturing under the then newly founded "University Extension Scheme." His friendship with Father Suffield, a famous Dominican preacher and missionary, who had become a Unitarian minister a few years earlier was a great help to him at this time. He made the acquaintance of Charles Beard, Richard Armstrong, Estlin Carpenter, and others, preached in Unitarian pulpits, and in 1874 was invited to succeed the last named as minister of Mill Hill Chapel, Leeds. Here for thirty-six years he found congenial work in his church and in the town. He took a keen interest in the Subscription Library, The Charity Organisation Society, Children's Holidays, and many other good things. He was President of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association (1910-11), and was elected President of the National Conference in 1915, an office which he still held at the time of his death. In 1912 he resigned his pulpit in Leeds, with the title of Minister Emeritus conferred on him by the congregation, went to reside for a time in Harrogate, and then removed to Hampstead, where he took up new duties on the Committees of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, the Hampstead Subscription Library, the Hampstead Council of Social Welfare, the Board of Directors of THE INQUIRER, &c. And all through to the end he maintained that same position of freedom and veracity which had led him to enter, and then to leave the Church of Rome. His Unitarianism was clear and strong, his faith in the principle of an entirely open road let it lead where it will was no less clear and strong. In his interest in the great teetotal movement into which he threw himself heartily during the latter part of his life, he was equally clear in his own mind, equally sincere, equally fair. And it was the same in regard to his political position as a Liberal, then as a Home Ruler with Gladstone, and in regard to the War, which he regarded as a "Holy War."

On Monday, June 17, he had a sudden seizure while out walking with a friend near Ventnor, where he was staying with his wife. On the following Wednesday he died about the same hour and on the same day of the month on which his only brother who lived to maturity, the Rev. Joseph Hargrove, late Vicar of St. Matthew's, Cambridge, and Honorary Canon of Ely, had died suddenly and alone while out walking in the woods at Beatenberg, four years before. The funeral service took place, as already recorded in THE INQUIRER, at the crematorium at Golders Green on the following Tuesday, and on Saturday last the ashes were laid to rest in Mill Hill Chapel.

No more need be said here. This is no record of all that he did but a memorial of what he was, and is, to those who knew him and loved him.

F. H. J.

The ashes of the late Dr. Hargrove were deposited on Saturday last in the chancel of Mill Hill Chapel, Leeds, at a service conducted by the Rev. C. J. Street, who in the course of his address said:—

A man like Dr. Hargrove, with so richly furnished a mind and spirit, with such varied and ripe experiences of many sides of life, with such charm of manner and grace of speech, with the desire to help his brethren so strong upon him and manifesting itself in activities of many kinds, cannot pass from our midst without leaving a great gap, which it will be difficult, if not, indeed, impossible to fill. No man can stand in another's place, and each has a role of his own to fill. But, fortunately—so rich is God's blessing in the life of humanity—there is ever an honourable succession of consecrated souls, each fulfilling its own task, each obeying a somewhat different call from the Holy Spirit, and each, all unconsciously, by obedience to the Divine leading, fitting in to its appropriate niche in the great pattern which is being worked out for the life of man. When leaders fall, the call for leadership is made anew, and not in vain.

TRIBUTES OF THE LEEDS PRESS.

Possibly there is no more accurate testimony as to the real influence of a religious leader than the opinion of the daily press, which is, as a rule, attached to no Church. The following extracts from the newspapers of the city where he laboured so long will show the position which Dr. Hargrove had attained in the eyes of the general public:—

Yorkshire Post: The fame of Mill Hill Chapel, Leeds, where the celebrated Priestley, discoverer of oxygen, once ministered, is hardly less known to Unitarians everywhere than the scholarly writings and thoughtful addresses of Charles Hargrove. A man of wide reading and clear and independent judgment, one of the first impressions he made upon strangers was that of intellectual force and individuality, softened not so much by modesty as by the instant concession of equal liberty and independence of mind on the part of any who differed from him.

Leeds Mercury: His eloquent and cultured preaching maintained the standard that had been set by such predecessors as Dr. Priestley, the Rev. Chas. Wicksteed, the Rev. Thos. Hincks, and Dr. Estlin Carpenter.

Yorkshire Observer: How well he succeeded may be deduced from the fact that in his later years at Mill Hill he was recognised as the doyen of the social and religious community of Leeds. His gift of lucid and restrained eloquence had extended the influence of his teaching far beyond the circle of those who formally adhered to the Unitarian faith. A scholar, he had ever been active in spreading the light of learning in the city. Not only had he stimulated its public spirit by his words, but had himself set a fine example of personal participation in social service.

Y.M.C.A. WORK IN FRANCE.

ANNUAL SYNOD MEETINGS IN BELFAST.

THESE meetings were held on Monday and Tuesday, June 17 and 18, in the First Presbyterian Church, Rosemary Street, Belfast. They were made peculiarly interesting and valuable this year by the presence of Dr. J. Estlin Carpenter, who kindly accepted the invitation to preach the annual sermon and deliver the annual lecture. Usually neither the business nor the public meetings are marked by very large attendances; but this year the presence of Dr. Carpenter drew large audiences to the public meetings from all sections of the religious public, and not only did his utterances bring a new inspiration to the non-subscribing churches, but undoubtedly they did a great deal to quicken the interest and break down the prejudice of the broader-minded members of other churches.

The first meeting was that of the Remonstrant Synod, the Rev. S. E. Bowen presiding, when the following officers for the ensuing year were unanimously elected: Moderator, the Rev. G. J. Slipper; Clerk, the Rev. J. Barron; Assistant Clerk, the Rev. D. J. Williams. The main business was the adoption of the reports of the Sustentation Fund, General Purposes Committee, and Finance Committee, and it was shown that the finances were most satisfactory, the revenue from the Sustentation Fund warranting an increase of dividend.

At the meeting of the Non-Subscribing Presbyterian Association, the Rev. E. S. Hicks in the chair, the following elections were unanimously made: President, the Rev. S. L. Phelps; Secretary, the Rev. H. J. Rossington (re-elected); Treasurer, the Rev. J. A. Kelly (re-elected). The statement of accounts, including the Theological Professorship Compensation Fund, which was adopted, showed a balance on the right side, but the Rev. J. A. Kelly said that future demands might require increased contributions from the congregations. The report of the Orphan Society showed that although the sum of £345 10s. was paid that year to orphans, there was a very large balance over. The Rev. E. H. Pickering moved, and Mr. W. H. N. Nelson seconded, a proposal that the Governors be recommended to increase the grant made to orphans, and that the investment of income as capital be deprecated. This was unanimously carried.

The annual meetings of the church began on Monday evening with a largely attended reception to Dr. Carpenter in the Central Hall, which was followed by divine service in the First Church, conducted by Dr. Carpenter. There was an excellent attendance, and the sermon made a deep impression, one of the leading Presbyterian divines who was present declaring that he had heard nothing finer. Dr. Carpenter took as his text the words "We are God's fellow-workers." The words, Dr. Carpenter said, pointed out a fundamental fact of our nature. The whole of our life was a partnership in an existence vaster than our own. All round about us lay the depths of Being, and out of that we came helpless and ignorant, stumbling and blind, until we began to feel our way and know our place and learn the meaning of life. Life was forever offering them new opportunities and summoning them to exercise themselves in austere labours and righteousness. After referring to the bearing of such ideas on the formation of character, the relations in industrial life, and the State, Dr. Carpenter asked could they carry the conception forward one step further? When they passed through the gates of death what did they expect to find? A void in which religion was lost and they themselves disappeared and ceased to be? Was that the end of fellow-work with God? Those who had realised what God had done for them would not believe it.

They would regard their efforts, failures, victories, defeats, attainments, disappointments, pains, happiness, sorrows, and joys as a training for their Father's service. They would say: "Thus and thus has He humbled me, thus exalted me. I will commit myself to Him without fear, trusting that He has yet a purpose for me to fulfil."

The Synod meeting was held on Tuesday at 11 A.M., being preceded by the celebration of Holy Communion. The Rev. Alfred Turner was unanimously elected Moderator for the ensuing year, and in the course of his remarks said that as ministers they had a pressing duty. Many of their families had been bereaved, and it was for them to do their best to comfort and cheer those whom the war had stricken. As they knew, one of their ministers, the Rev. P. Godding of Ballyclare, who was serving as a second-lieutenant at the front, had been reported as missing since May 27, and they all hoped that he was still living, even if in enemy country. He wished to extend sincere sympathy to those members who had lost near or dear ones. The Rev. G. J. Slipper was unanimously re-elected Clerk of Synod, and the Rev. J. A. Kelly was unanimously re-elected Treasurer. A telegram of sympathy was sent to the relatives of the late Dr. James Drummond of Oxford, who was being interred that day. It was also resolved to send a loyal message to the King and to present a loyal address to the new Lord-Lieutenant.

The reports of the General Purposes Committee showed that the past year was on the whole uneventful. The Revs. G. L. Phelps (Holywood) and A. Turner (Templepatrick) have both given a second period of service with the Y.M.C.A., and the Rev. P. Godding (Ballyclare) has obtained a commission in the Royal Irish Rifles. The Rev. G. J. Slipper's report of the state of the Church showed little change in the number of members. The reports of the three Presbyteries, the Sunday School Committee and Temperance Committee were adopted.

At the afternoon session several interesting and important resolutions were brought forward. A resolution, proposed by the Rev. J. Barron, protesting against denominational control of education was carried unanimously, and also one moved by the Rev. G. L. Phelps affirming the desirability of establishing a League of Nations for the maintenance of right and the permanent preservation of peace. The Rev. E. H. Pickering proposed that steps should be taken by the General Purposes Committee for the early formation of a Union of Social Service on similar lines to the National Conference Union. This was passed unanimously. Other resolutions were passed referring to the establishment of a Clerkship Fund and to the prohibition of the drink traffic during the war with compensation. The Synod also passed unanimously a resolution proposed by the Rev. E. H. Pickering protesting against Regulation 40D as affirming a double standard of morality, and as a grave moral and physical danger. The meetings concluded with a thoughtful and inspiring lecture by Dr. Carpenter on 'The Churches after the War.'

THE third Lawrence House Bulletin, a copy of which is going out this week to all Unitarians in the Forces, so far as their names are known at Essex Hall, looks like being a welcome messenger wherever in the wide world it goes. It contains portraits of Mr. R. D. Holt, M.P., President of the Association, Mrs. Sydney Martineau, Mrs. Wooding, Mr. Harold Wade, and the late Major Harold Brown; greetings and short articles by different writers, information about Lawrence House, and other interesting matter. If any soldier or sailor in our connection does not receive a copy the Secretary, Essex Hall, will be obliged by receiving his name and address.

SCHOOL FOR MINISTERS AT MANCHESTER COLLEGE.

Information has reached me that some ministers who wish to attend the Autumn School at Manchester College have been deterred from applying by the prospect of the heavy expense to be incurred in travelling. Happily I am now in a position to say that a sum of money has been most generously placed at the disposal of the College which will enable this difficulty to be overcome.

May I therefore again urge upon ministers who wish to attend that they should send in their applications to me as soon as possible? Among other things that must be arranged at once, a house will have to be hired for the accommodation of the ministers, the College residence being occupied by wounded soldiers, and this, of course, we cannot do until we know how many are to be expected.—Yours, &c.,

L. P. JACKS.

Mr. J. A. Hobson and Mr. Laurence Housman will be the speakers at the Annual Meeting of the Humanitarian League at Caxton Hall, Westminster, on Monday, July 15. The chair will be taken at 7.30 P.M. by Bertram Lloyd.

In an article appearing in A Voice from India, which is edited by Mr. Haran-dranath Maitra, Mrinalini Sen quotes a prayer which was uttered, it is believed, about 5,000 years ago by a woman sage of India, and which is repeated in the Brahmo Samaj churches every day. The prayer is as follows :—

Lead me, O Lord, to the Truth from all Untruth.

Lead me from Darkness to Light.
Lead me from Death to immortality.
Be revealed to me, O Thou self-revealer!
Show me Thy Blissful Countenance and keep me under Thy Eternal Protection.

NOTES ON SOME RECENT BOOKS.

[A short Notice in this column does not preclude a review in a later issue.]

Carlisle (Bishop of). DEATH AND THE AFTER-LIFE. Williams & Norgate. 122 pp., 2s. 6d.

Dr. Diggle's unconventionalism is well known, and here finds scope; in addition to his native impulse the war conditions have evidently moved him to a fresh examination of his thoughts. Though, owing much to inherited ways of expression, many of his suggestions will be found novel by the ordinary Christian reader, in general they are reasonable as well as devout, and may be pondered with profit by heterodox as well as orthodox.

Hunter (the Rev. Dr. John). FAITH IN STORMY DAYS. James Maclehose & Sons. 171 pp., 3s. 6d. n.

Six sermons on the Twenty-Third Psalm are here reproduced, originally delivered in the Æolian Hall in the summer of 1915; a seventh entitled 'The True Measure of Life' is added, being one of the last sermons Dr. Hunter preached. Prayers are prefixed to each discourse, and a final prayer 'In Time of War' closes the volume. It is a truly beautiful legacy to the world from one who was a gifted speaker and a tender teacher; his life work is here represented at its highest level.

Jupp (William J.). WAYFARINGS. London, Headley Bros. 234 pp., 8s. n.

Mr. Jupp describes this book as "a record of adventure and liberation in the life of the Spirit." Those who have read his articles from time to time will hardly need to be told that he has been a sojourner with beauty through the whole course of his wayfaring, and that he has kept his eyes fixed, amid all experiences, on the Real Presence which is "great enough for man's absolute trust and reverence and love." The last chapter is entitled 'The Broken and Recovered Peace,' and ends on a note of quiet hope and confidence which is the priceless "treasure of the humble."

The Life of Amelle Nicolas; translated from the French by Thomas Taylor Allen. London, H. R. Allenson, Ltd. 266 pp., 5s. n.

This translation of the Life of "the good Armelle," a peasant by birth, by occupation a servant, with spiritual affinities with all the great mystics, has been made from the third edition which appeared at Cologne in 1704. It is introduced by a letter from Prof. Dowden, who is not concerned with the authorship of the biography, but with the actual experiences it relates and "the disinterestedness of love, the supersession of self, the union of what is above self" which are expressed with a beautiful sincerity "not surpassed in books more famous."

Montefiore (Claude G.). LIBERAL JUDAISM AND HELLENISM, AND OTHER ESSAYS. 340 pp. London, Macmillan, 6s. n.

The distinguished author here presents a course of lectures which were prepared for delivery in the United States in 1915 but had to be postponed on account of the war. Other chapters have appeared substantially in various periodicals. Besides its relations to Hellenism the book discusses Liberal Judaism's attitude towards the Old and New Testaments, Rabbinical Literature, Democracy, and the Future. Recent developments in Jewish "Nationalism" are specially noticed. Scholarly, earnest, candid, such a volume merits wide-spread attention.

Morland (Lucy Fryer), B.A. THE NEW SOCIAL OUTLOOK. London, Headley Bros. 59 pp., 1s. 6d. n.

The Swarthmore Lecture for 1918. Miss Morland traces the growth of Quaker philanthropy and the instinct for social service from early days, and shows how essential it is that the new attitude should be faced which has been brought about largely "under the stress and shaking of the Great War."

Problems of Reconstruction. By various writers. London, T. Fisher Unwin. 315 pp., 8s. 6d. n.

Lectures and addresses delivered at the Summer Meeting at the Hampstead Garden Suburb, August, 1917, by Canon Masterman, Prof. Muirhead, the Rt. Hon. W. H. Dickinson, M.P., Mr. Sidney Webb, Miss May Morris, Miss Maude Royden, Mr. George Clausen, R.A., and others. The section on 'Arts and Crafts in Relation to Reconstruction,' is particularly interesting and suggestive, and will be appreciated by those who feel that the imagination has not been too kindly treated in the discussions which have already taken place on "after the war" prospects.

Problems of To-morrow. Edited by F. A. Rees, with an Introduction by the Rev. Arthur Jones, M.A., D.Lit. London, Messrs. James Clarke & Co. 256 pp., 4s. 6d. n.

These addresses, written for the most part by Free Churchmen—the names include Principal Forsyth, Dr. Orchard, Principal Garvie, Dr. Rendal Harris, Dr. Frank Ballard, Dr. Henry Hodgkin, &c.—were first delivered in an "After the War Campaign," arranged by the Birmingham District Free Church Council in the early winter of 1917, and it has been thought advisable to give a wider public the opportunity of profiting by them. No attempt is made at continuity; each lecturer chose his own subject, and, in dealing with it, expressed his own views; but a common idea underlies them all, based as they are on a realisation of the problems—social, moral and religious—which will have to be considered after the war from the Christian standpoint.

Ruffin (Henry) and Tudesq (André). BROTHER TOMMY. London, Fisher Unwin. 160 pp., 1s. 3d. n.

A story of the British offensive on the Western front from January to June, 1917, translated from the French. The narrative is full of human touches, but some of the "things seen," though described briefly and with singular detachment, remain etched on the memory like pictures from Dante's Inferno.

Tilley (Arthur), M.A. THE DAWN OF THE FRENCH RENAISSANCE. Cambridge University Press. 24 pls., 25s. n.

This book, which ought really to have been the introduction to the author's 'Literature of the French Renaissance,' attempts to bring to a focus the first manifestations of the Renaissance spirit, "not only in humanism and literature, but in architecture, sculpture, painting, and every form of art." The writing of it was interrupted by the war, but as the final victory has been so long delayed, it has been thought best to complete and publish the work. We are glad that this decision was arrived at, especially in view of the fact that we are probably "nearing the dawn of a greater Renaissance" than that which is the subject of its pages, a Renaissance that will be "largely of the spirit," and will be better understood by those who have first traced the growth of the earlier movement. The book is dedicated "To France."

PAMPHLETS.

Clifford (John), M.A., D.D. OUR FIGHT FOR BELGIUM AND WHAT IT MEANS. London, Hodder & Stoughton. 15 pp., 3d.

The title of this pamphlet explains its purport. It is written in Dr. Clifford's characteristically trenchant manner.

Duffy (G. Gavan), B.L. THE GROUNDWORK OF CONSCRIPTION. London, T. Fisher Unwin. 29 pp., 6d. n.

A useful epitome of the Military Service Code in Great Britain with the disciplinary measures, civil and military, for its enforcement.

Grey (Viscount, of Falloden), K.G. THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS. Oxford University Press. 15 pp., 3d. n.

Lord Grey's important pronouncement was referred to in our columns last week.

Hawkin (R. C.). CENTRAL AFRICA AND THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS. The Fabian Society. 15 pp., 2d.

In this Fabian tract Mr. R. C. Hawkin pursues the idea, which he has been advocating strenuously, that Central Africa should be internationalised, and he points out that all the machinery is ready to hand "for summoning a meeting of the League of Nations" to consider it. "Central Africa," he reminds us "will never be the same as before the war—the influence of the tribal chiefs will disappear, the tribes will split up, the white man's influence will be different, and the missionary will have to battle with new ideas which are surging through the black mind."

Mühlön (W.). REVELATIONS BY AN EX-DIRECTOR OF KRUPP'S. London, Hodder & Stoughton. 12 pp., 3d. n.

The text of Dr. Mühlön's Memorandum and of his letter to Herr von Bethmann Hollweg.

Orage (A. R.). AN ENGLISHMENT TALKS IT OUT WITH AN IRISHMAN. Fisher Unwin. 31 pp., 6d. n.

In this dialogue, which recently appeared in The New Age as the Editor's 'Notes of the Week,' it is urged with much cogency that a solution of the present deadlock, of happy augury to Ireland herself, would be the "voluntary service of Ireland in the common cause" based on "an honourable understanding." It is agreed that "England owes an earnest to Ireland of the sincerity of her profession that this is a war of liberation for small nations."

To Make Men Traitors. London, Hodder & Stoughton. 26 pp., 2d.

A pamphlet dealing with Germany's attempts to seduce our prisoners of war and destroy their national loyalty.

We have also received The Hibbert Journal, The Quest, Cornhill Magazine, and The Strand Magazine.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Billingshurst.—For the first time for some years there was a good attendance of children at the special Flower Service at the Free Christian Church on June 23. The flowers which had been contributed were taken later on to the London Hospital.

Birmingham.—Mr. P. C. Whiteman, son of the Rev. J. M. Whiteman, Missionary at Hurst Street, has recently obtained his B.A. degree at Manchester University.

Knutsford.—The Rev. G. A. Payne, minister of Brook Street Chapel, begins his 29th year at Knutsford and Allostock on July 7, when collections will be taken on behalf of the Hospital Supply Depot, and it is hoped a large number of members and friends will be present at the services. Mr. Payne has promised to conduct the evening service at the Unitarian Church, Macclesfield, once a month during the summer in the absence of the Rev. J. Hipperson, who has joined the forces.

Glossop.—On Sunday, June 16, anniversary services were held at the Unitarian Church, the three services being largely attended. At the children's service at 10.45 Mr. Peter Skelton, U.K.A., Glossop, delivered an address. The preacher in the afternoon and evening was the Rev. Neander Anderton, of Monton. Special anthems were sung.

London: Hampstead.—The Rev. F. K. Freeston, who is taking the services at Rosslyn Hill Chapel during the Rev. H. Gow's absence in France is delivering a series of Sunday evening addresses during July on 'Apostles and Founders, English and American.' On Sunday, July 7, he will take for his subject, 'Roger Williams, the Founder of Rhode Island'; July 14, 'John Eliot, the Founder of the New England Co.'; July 21, 'John Harvard, the Founder of Harvard College'; July 28, 'William Penn, the Founder of Pennsylvania.'—As was mentioned at the Special General Meeting on May 5, Mr. Gow was induced shortly before leaving for France to sit for his portrait, and this may now be seen in the Church Parlour. The artist is M. Jean Delville, the distinguished Belgian painter.

London: Islington.—The Rev. J. Vint Laughland, who has been minister of Unity Church since 1915, and has been engaged in war work at Woolwich Arsenal, in addition to his pastoral duties, for over a year, has tendered his resignation. The work has been carried on under increasing difficulties, and a serious position has now to be considered. There was a good congregation at the War Workers' Service on June 6, when Mr. Laughland gave an interesting account of his experiences at the Arsenal, in the course of which he had come into personal contact with a large number of the many thousand workers now employed there.—Another old and faithful member of the Church has passed away in Mr. S. D. Welch, who died on June 4.

London: Stepney.—At the Flower Show and Industrial Exhibition in connection with College Chapel opened by Miss Ethel C. Lake on Thursday, June 27, Miss A. Read, Secretary of the Sunday school, in the name of the teachers and scholars took the opportunity of making a presentation to the Rev. Walter M. Long, who has accepted a call to Loughborough and Christ Church, Nottingham. Mr. Snowling voiced the deep regret which is felt at parting with him. Later on the members and friends of the congregation assembled by invitation of the committee to meet Mr. Long. In the course of the evening the Chapel Secretary presented him with an Address from the members and friends expressing their affection and esteem and asking his acceptance of a study chair. Miss Tagart, Mr. Snowling, the Rev. Harry Maguire and Mr. E. Buser paid warm tributes to Mr. Long and to the good influence he had exerted at Stepney. In responding Mr. Long said he should carry away very happy memories of this, his first ministry, and though he was looking forward to his new sphere, he should watch with great interest the progress of the congregation of College Chapel. On June 30 the evening service took the form of a reconsecration and dedication service, and several new members were welcomed into fellowship. Taking as a keynote "Thou shalt call thy walls salvation and thy gates praise," Mr. Long emphasised the joy and the sanctifying or saving power of united worship, both to minister and people. He touched on the sufferings and sacrifices of the past which had won for us freedom of worship, and he earnestly exhorted his hearers to avail themselves constantly of this privilege which gives such a precious opportunity of spiritual growth.

Manchester: Chorlton-cum-Hardy.—A garden party was held last week in the grounds of Mr. and Mrs. Hillier for the purpose of bidding farewell to the Rev. Charles Peach, Mrs. Peach and family. Mr. Peach has been with the Chorlton congregation about seven years and he is now leaving them to become minister of the Old Chapels at Great Hucklow and Bradwell, and to take the charge of the Holiday and Convalescent Homes of which he is the hon. secretary. Mr. Henry Pilling presiding at a brief meeting spoke of Mr. Peach's residence at Chorlton as a period of unbroken happiness and prosperity for congregation and minister alike, and presented Mr. Peach with a framed illuminated address and a cheque. Mrs. Hillier on behalf of the Ladies Society presented Mrs. Peach with a travelling bag, and Miss Elsie Begg presented a selection of books to Mr. A. Peach on behalf of the Sunday school.

Mottram.—The Rev. A. G. Goodwin (United Methodist) was the preacher at the afternoon Flower Service at the Unitarian Church on June 23, the Rev. H. Bodell Smith preaching in the evening.—Mr. Bodell Smith's son, Mr. E. W. Smith, a former Sunday scholar, now chief chemist to the Birmingham City Gas Department, has had the degree of Doctor of Science conferred on him by Manchester University.

Preston.—The annual Choir Services were held last Sunday at the Unitarian Church, special anthems and solos being rendered. There was a good congregation in the evening. The services were conducted by Opl. M. Rowe, the minister of the church, who is at present stationed at Blackpool, and who preached in the morning on 'Joyful Worship,' and in the evening on 'The Ear for Harmony.'

Rochdale.—It is announced in The Monthly Messenger that Pte. John William Baron, of the 16th Batt. Lancs. Fusiliers, was killed in action in France on April 3.

Sheffield.—The second number of The District Messenger, published by the District Association, contains a revision of the Roll of Honour which appeared in the first (January) number, and a selection of appropriate quotations in verse and prose.—The Rev. Alfred Hall, of Newcastle-on-Tyne, will commence his ministry at Upper Chapel, as colleague of the Rev. C. J. Street, on August 4.

Sheffield: Unity Church.—The death is recorded of Mr. B. Yates, one of the oldest members and most faithful workers connected with the church. Private A. Stenton, who was formerly a member of the Sunday school, and whose daughter is a scholar and member of the choir, was killed in hospital in France recently.

Stannington.—The preacher at the Sunday school anniversary on May 26, at Underbank Chapel, was Mrs. Pryce-Jones, whose services were so warmly appreciated last year. The music and singing were exceptionally good. The organist for the day was Miss Mary Wild, one of the Sunday school teachers and a girl of only 15 years of age.

Women's League.—The Summer Meeting of the Manchester District Associate Branch of the League was held at Stand on June 22. There was an attendance of 150 representing the following branches: Accrington, Ansdell, Ashton-under-Lyne, Blackley, Bury (Bank Street), Chesham, Chowbent, Denton, Dukinfield, Gee Cross, Monton, Oldham Road (Manchester), Oldham, Pendleton, Stand, Stalybridge and Stockport. In spite of unfavourable weather the visit to Stand was much enjoyed, thanks to the kindly hospitality of the friends there. Dr. E. Thackray conducted service in the chapel in the afternoon, and gave an address on 'Mothers.' A short meeting was held after tea, Miss Johnstone presiding. Mrs. Thackray welcomed the visitors, and Miss Storrs, as delegate to the Whit-week meetings in London, gave an interesting account of these meetings. A cordial vote of thanks to the friends at Stand was responded to by Mrs. D. Walmsley. An enjoyable ramble in Miss Phillips's Park, and to Prestwich, followed.

 Secretaries of churches which publish Calendars are requested to send the Calendars regularly, and as soon as possible after publication, to the Editor.*

 THE INQUIRER welcomes items of news likely to be of special interest to its readers, and is ready to pay for such news when accepted by the Editor, the scale depending upon its importance and suitability in form and matter for insertion. All contributions should be addressed to the Editor, INQUIRER Office, 13 Bream's Buildings, London, E.C.4, and should be received not later than the first post on Wednesday morning in each week.*

DEATH.

McEwan.—On June 27, at Maple Bank, Edgbaston, Birmingham, Mrs. M. A. McEwan, aged 89.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

All letters and manuscripts for the Editor should be sent to 13 Bream's Buildings, Fetter Lane, London, E.C.4. They must reach the Editor not later than Wednesday morning for publication the same week.

THE issue of the Montagu Report on Indian Reforms is an event of the highest possible importance. We wish we could assure ourselves that, despite preoccupations with the war, our politicians, journalists, and all other publicists—including teachers and preachers—will attentively study its three hundred pages of history, forecast and legislative proposals. Admirable in its reforming spirit it appears sufficiently cautious in detail; but that is a matter upon which we must, of course, listen to experts, such as our friend Sir Roland Wilson, who has promised us an early article on Indian affairs. What we can all try to do is to augment the force of sympathy with a generous policy toward our Indian fellow-subjects. There is undoubtedly a large bulk of Anglo-Indian obstructiveness to reckon with, and if we are to make any real progress an instructed zeal for liberty alike in India and our other dependencies must be greatly increased in this country.

THERE is in the closing sentence of the body of the Report on India a suggestion that applies nearer home. It reads, "English and Indian papers alike have it in their power greatly to improve relations" between the two races. Unfortunately, both abroad and in this country, the journalistic power which seems most to be realised, certainly to be exercised, is not that which makes for improved relations among men. There is a section of the press already so notorious that nothing it can do can lower its character in this respect. At present its quarry happens to be "Aliens," but that is a mere exigency of the moment. Apparently someone must be hunted down every day—Kitchener, Haldane, Grey, Jellicoe, what matters who?

IN some cases a show of public urgency has been made, but generally the outcry is obviously a mere appeal to ignorant prejudice, and this "Aliens stunt" is just about as shabby an enterprise as the yelping pack of hounds has yet started. If the Executive have not sufficient restriction and punitive authority—which is hard to believe—they had but to ask for it, and a compliant Parliament would have granted it long ago. If they have the power but have been negligent, bring the blame home to them and let them pay the penalty. But to howl at all and sundry who happen not to be as pure in blood as these noble patriots, may indeed stir the lower passions of the mob, but cannot add to the healthy vigour of the nation's mind or increase its reputation amongst neutral observers.

* * *

LAST Saturday's Carmarthen Weekly Reporter contains in extenso the address given by Dr. G. Dawes Hicks at the closing of the session at the Presbyterian College. He eloquently defended our people against the charge that we were a decadent nation; despite acknowledged faults there was that in men's hearts that had heroically responded to the tragic summons of the war. Our danger now was that minds should be deadened through sheer mass of misery, and that we also, as well as our foes, should set material gains in the first place. But the war had shown that quite "ordinary people" were far more open to high appeals and ideals than they seemed to be. Multitudes have given themselves for duty's sake, and a deeper religious sense has awakened in the hearts of sorrowing relatives. The perusal of this fine address recalls the wish of many of Dr. Hicks' admirers that some goodly portion, at least, of the long series delivered by him at the College on similar occasions, should be collected into a permanent volume.

FOR more than twenty years some striking verses, entitled 'Each in his own Tongue,' have been known by many thoughtful readers, and their popularity is to-day greater than ever. The verses allude to the story of earth—"some call it evolution, and others call it God," to the beauty of autumn and the yearnings of the heart; and the closing one runs:—

A picket frozen on duty,—
A mother starved for her brood,—
Socrates drinking the hemlock,
And Jesus on the rood;
And millions who, humble and nameless,
The straight, hard pathway plod,—
Some call it Consecration,
And others call it God.

These words, we notice, were quoted by Dr. Hicks in the address referred to above. The Rev. R. J. Campbell similarly used, at the City Temple two or three years ago, a poem 'Glory enough for one day' which is also familiar. What is not so well known is that the writer, Professor William Herbert Caruth, who is connected with the Stanford University, California, is a good zealous Unitarian who takes a prominent part in church and association work in his country.

* * *

WE are sure Mrs. Bernard Allen's account of the hospital at Chambéry which appears this week will be read with much interest, and that many readers' interest will speedily take a practical turn. As we observed a short time since in reference to our Belgian Fund, the great thing in this good work is that it is both animated by the best intentions and controlled by wise judgment and faithful economy. The extension, as we must view it, of the scope of the new institution so as to include suffering civilians will not, we believe, be deemed injudicious. The needs of this stricken people are beyond any adequate supply, but what can be done by us to relieve the poor creatures must be done, and as well and quickly as possible.

"A CULTIVATED Unitarian," we are told in last week's Musical Times (apropos of the Gounod centenary) made 'Faust' the subject of a sermon, in which he

"found in Mephistopheles's laughter at the end of the third act the Greek Nemesis, but he also found something uplifting in the melodies." Can any one identify the preacher? The writer proceeds—"However that may be, it will not be misunderstood, perhaps, if we say that a faint odour of incense clings to these times—'about as much religion as my William likes', in Hannah More's words."

* * *

THE Florence Nightingale Convalescent Home, Great Hucklow, the opening of which we chronicle this week, aims at becoming a "National Memorial" to our men who have fallen or will hereafter fall in the war. In the first instance, its benefits are intended for men discharged from the Forces, and if this intention is properly carried into effect the further use of the Home, viz., as a recreative institution for scholars and teachers in our Sunday schools, must be considerably postponed. But its memorial character will remain, and we may surely expect that many generations of grateful young visitors will realise that here, as in so much beside, their life has been helped and blessed through the self-sacrifice of our gallant sons and brothers. Commending our brief report to immediate notice, we shall return to the subject at an early date.

SOLDIERS AND CITIZENS.

STILL echoes the tramp of new hosts from the regions,

Far off is the vanguard—they came, they are gone;

The World in its wonder is counting the legions,

Is watching and counting, and still they march on.

"Why rally your millions?" she asks them; replying

They point to the foe of the Freedom of Earth;

Be theirs but to smite him, then living or dying

Their soul shall be satisfied, even to mirth.

Good Soldiers, good Citizens, theirs is the duty

In war to lay firm the foundations of Peace,

To follow, through hell-reek, a Vision of beauty

High throned on a compact that never shall cease.

Yet strange is the cup that is proffered them daily,

Afoam with the glory that passes—like foam;

They, gallant but wary, accept the draught gaily,

They laugh, and they sing, but their heart is at Home.

O Soldiers of Freedom, O Citizens fighters,
To Home and humanity loyal and true,
O wisest of war-men and sanest of smiters,

The hope, and the heart, of the World is with you!

THE GREATER FRANCE.

ABOUT four years ago we happened to be in conversation with a man of many travels, a practised linguist, a shrewd observer and one obviously desiring to be just. The monstrous birth of war was as yet in the womb of time, but premonitory throes were already convulsing Europe. Glancing at, rather than attempting fully to explore the probabilities, as we thought them, of the next few weeks—though our surmises, alas, fell immeasurably short of the event—the respective characters of different nations came into view. Among the first to be considered was that of France, and our friend's estimate was not at all favourable. He certainly had more than sufficient data to justify pessimism; and, if some were but superficial, others were decidedly not so. They need not be re-stated here and now; enough to say they were drawn mostly from aspects of contemporary life, social, financial, judicial, political, artistic, literary, and the survey as a whole was not reassuring.

But the cure for all despondency is a fuller remembrance. In the first place, any single observer, however widely experienced and keen, can at best see only a fraction of the nation's life; and if he is wise he is careful to avoid sweeping generalisations based on fragmentary evidence. Some people there are, far too many, who on the strength of a few weeks in Paris from time to time, supplemented by an intermittent acquaintance with French journals, fiction, and drama, are prepared to return the most confident verdict as to the tastes, morals, and tendencies of the whole population. If hasty judgment of an individual is wrong, how much more of a nation. But, in the second place, the sounder critic, ranging farther, will also go deeper. To know the present France, to forecast the France of the future, we must bear in mind the France of the past; we must try to discern beneath the ephemeral story the under-currents of history.

The anniversary of the Fall of the Bastille, July 14, is an opportune reminder of the world's debt to France; it is at the same time, let us believe, the propitious omen of another Fall, of another stronghold of tyranny. The system symbolised by the ancient prison doubtless thought itself no tyranny at all; it stood for "resolute government" just as modern autocracies do. It fell before what? A mob of ignorant, greasy rebels—the autocrat would say. Let us say it fell before an idea. For it is the will that counts, the directing power within the muscles. The France we recognise is the France of great ideas; and even if they are sometimes conceived in heat, passion, fury, or apparently in an adventurousness of mind that to us Northerners seems romantic and sentimental, the world would be vastly poorer without them. Their very excesses, as we deem them, are proof at least of an intense vitality such as mankind needs, in order to counteract, were it possible, the stupidity against which the gods themselves strive in vain.

"When Mill was in low spirits," we are told, "he restored himself by Condorcet's life of Turgot." If ever we English are disposed to think somewhat gloomily of the France whose faults, not being our own, are the more conspicuous to us, let us follow Mill's example and take an excursion into her storied past. It will not only afford us types of "brilliance," but also of solid sense, masculine gravity, indefatigable toil in the pursuit of the higher wealth as well as thrift in material things, devotion to science, love of beauty, exalted spirituality, generous humanity. This is the France whose sufferings we deplore, whose valour we admire, whose resolution we fraternally share. It is hers to provide a leader for the Allies against a stronghold of tyranny more formidable than that of 1789. It will be hers, we confidently believe, to help the world by her talent of constructive precision, no less than by her splendour of impulse, when the Bastille of Prussianism is brought down.

PRIESTLEY.

A CORRESPONDENT has reminded me that July 14 is the anniversary of the Priestley riots. I am glad to remember that Priestley was on the fringe of martyrdom, for I must confess that my sympathies with him have worn rather thin. The diffident Socinus, the generous Castellio, the aggravating Servetus, all these, though further away, still strike responsive chords. But Priestley for all his energy and restlessness cannot galvanise us. Yet I should like to like Priestley better. Charles Lamb sat under him, and expressed his admiration of him in Elizabethan phrase. But Hazlitt's contemptuous criticism, though it has an acrid flavour, seems nearer the truth. Hazlitt compares him with the sinister Jonathan Edwards, and disparages Priestley for talking glibly of awful spiritual experiences as if they were parts of a game of logic.

Priestley's portrait rather bears this out. The face would be grave but for a strong suggestion of almost perky complacency which we might like in a Sterne or a Voltaire, but which is strangely misplaced here, for the effect of gravity and the effect of levity mutually destroy each other. Moreover, this lack of depth is emphasised by the unfortunate habit we have of hanging his portrait beside that of Price, in which the meditative texture of the face is enhanced by a kind of brooding dignity of figure. Priestley's portrait recalls Martineau's dictum—most dogmatic when most wrong. A common fault—the fault of the mob that attacked his house.

Hazlitt's verdict really amounts to a reminder that "fools rush in where angels fear to tread." All his life Priestley was up to his neck in controversies on questions which he had not half digested. Though a scientist he was quite lacking in sense of first principles. Vigorous and brilliant thoughts are not used to deduce conclusions, but are simply flashed out on us. Neither in religion or politics does he ever seem to stand on the real ground of the matter. But in spite of his faults, perhaps because of his haphazard methods, he had the astonishing luck that sometimes comes to the daring. In science, religion, and politics, he blundered on truths which startled his contemporaries, and made him friends and foes. In one of his controversies on the question of the deity of Christ, he suddenly puts his argument in a most striking way, and the manner in which he makes his point has been much praised by that acute and generous critic, Leslie Stephen. That point is that it would have been quite impossible for the disciples while they ate and drank and talked with Jesus to believe that this man whom they knew was God Almighty who created heaven and earth. This is really suggestive. It makes us feel that a halo of time and distance was absolutely essential for the development of doctrines about Christ. We realise that in the systematising of Christianity, not to have known Christ in the flesh was an immense advantage.

Because he had no historical sense of the growth of institutions, no method of mental progress, but only a series of sudden leaps, Priestley never grasped the significance of his own ideas. They are sparks of fire stolen from heaven by luck or daring. He seems to have thought that after Christ Christianity stopped, and there arose a carnival of imposture, masquerading as the church of Christ. We can see now that the development of the Church followed the limitations of human imagination and human needs, and arose out of the necessities of hard fact. Had the world been different "the mind of Christ" would have been shaped by time and distance in other moulds, and expressed not in the doctrines which we know, but in other doctrines more satisfying to other needs. The needs dictated the doctrines. This is the new method; the method of modernism, and Priestley must be recognised as one of those who have made it essential that the new theology must understand its relation to the old theology. This is the value of his book, 'The Corruptions of Christianity.'

In his political thinking we see just the same kind of thing. He half strangles himself at the outset in the old "social contract" theory and in a tangle of Rousseau. And so though he arrives at the conclusion that governments must grow out of, and exist for, the needs of the people, he does not in politics, any more than in religion, throw over the old encumbrances and start fair from this illuminating principle. Still he has hit on the principle, and believes that to it the ultimate appeal must be made in politics and theology. I honour him for this, and all the more because his persecution gives it the glow of a profound conviction which otherwise it would not have had.

WHERE IS THE RELIGIOUS CENTRE?

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—The discussion having assumed a new phase perhaps some comments may be permissible. I do not wish to question Dr. Mellor's position that the Christian Theist sees God through Christ, but I may point out that the vision is not so objective as it appears. If we associate it with a certain historical individual we have never seen his form, and our picture of him is biassed by at least two subjective influences. First that of the biographer, who may not be an eyewitness; and what a difference the character of the recorder may make let a comparison between the Second and the Fourth Gospels show; and secondly that of our own religious imagination. But I venture to claim that the title of Christian Theist is equally appropriate if it does not primarily belong to one who desires to see God as Jesus saw him! We range ourselves by the side of our brother, and in faith behold the universal Father who makes his sun to shine on the evil and the good and his rain to fall on the just and the unjust. There is a fundamental difference in the two positions. In the one, God is seen through a medium and the revelation can only be partial, confined to those who know and accept the medium; whereas the other is consistent with a universal vision as extensive as "the light which lighteth every man that cometh into the world," and which made Peter exclaim, "Of a truth I see that God is no respecter of persons, but in every nation he that feareth God and worketh righteousness is accepted of him."

I wish to make myself perfectly clear on this point. I believe the healthy mind must pay due respect to both the subjective and the objective; but let us begin by seeing God in his works to-day, by valuing their appeal to our spiritual nature, and for the rest let us recognise the dualism in our own nature, for the self is both subjective and objective.

He who himself and God would know
Into the silence let him go,
And lifting there pall after pall
Reach to the inmost depth of all.

And this brings me to Mr. Alfred Hall. The clear notes of his first letter came with a bracing effect on one who had felt rather limp after perusing the previous correspondence. But surely Dr. Mellor was justified in questioning Mr. Hall's right to talk of revolt. Are not our churches free? If so, how can there be a revolt over questions of doctrine? Or is it implied that a certain usage and attitude of thought has been established and to go against them is rebellion? Perhaps there is a tendency to think thus! But Mr. Hall told us in clear words on what he based his belief in God and for that we owe him hearty thanks. I, too, have found the inductive method the only satisfactory one. It is true that in some moods or under the influence of some writers there may be a temporary change of view, but the lasting and satisfying one must be God as he reveals himself in the present and in one's own soul.

But this seems to lead to a less sectarian position than that apparently held by Mr. Hall. Logically accepted it would abolish sects and all 'isms having their roots in past theological controversies. The appeal would be universal, and surely that would be a great gain. At present if a man changes his Church he is expected to adopt another label, and that he is not always prepared to do; and in some cases labels create prejudices and hide rather than reveal what the Churches profess to stand for.

We want a Church based upon the ethical and spiritual needs of man and not upon points of intellectual agreement; a Church that could include such men as the late Professor James and H. G. Wells; a Church that would be a spiritual democracy where the centre of holiness would be the fire in men's hearts. Such a Church would, of course, not appeal to all; tradition, usage and authority would keep them in old grooves; but it might draw in the millions that at present remain outside. It would appeal to the sense of brotherhood, break down the barriers of race and class, find converts in all climes, and its Bible would be universally understood, for it is the word written in men's hearts. Only such a Church, I think, can herald a world's peace, and such a Church would be essentially Christian.—Yours, &c.,

EDWARD CAPLETON.

THE venerable Dr. Washington Gladden whose death is just announced from Columbus, Ohio, was a truly liberal-minded theologian, a preacher of the social gospel, and a verse writer of no mean order. His recent utterances gave proof of his stalwart faith in liberty and progress, and of a personal vigour amazing at his advanced age.

THE BELGIAN HOSPITAL AT CHAMBÉRY.

My visit to France this time was specially made to see the hospital for tuberculous Belgian soldiers at Chambéry. It is beautifully situated on a hillside about half an hour's walk from the town, in a building which was formerly used as a summer residence for a community of monks, before those communities were suppressed. The building is in the form of a quadrangle, owing to which there is the great advantage that most of the wards have windows on both sides, so that there is plenty of light and air. Of course, the beds are nearer to each other than one could wish, but "c'est la guerre," which is the answer given to so many criticisms. Tuberculosis has unfortunately many victims in the Belgian army now, and it is not surprising when one thinks of the conditions in their trenches, the wet and the long cold winters, and the fact that the men have not many of the amenities that the soldiers of their more wealthy allies possess. I believe, too, that the worry and anxiety that many of them have to bear about their families lay them open to attack. There are about 150 patients in this hospital, and with the personnel the population is about 200. The water supply depends entirely on the rainfall, and when I was there there had been no rain for two months. As far as I could see there was not likely to be any sort of supply before next winter, and then it would be wholly insufficient. At present every drop has to be brought up from Chambéry in barrels and emptied into huge tubs standing outside the kitchen. There is no water, naturally, on any of the floors inhabited by the patients. This means that those who can do so have to go downstairs and out across the courtyard, where there are 7 tin basins for 200 people; and these basins have to be filled and emptied by hand. There are four douches and two baths already installed, but under present conditions they cannot be used at all. The cleanliness of the wards and staircases necessarily leaves much to be desired when every drop of water has to be fetched up several long flights of stairs and brought down again after using.

I spent a week at the hospital among the patients and went into the question of the possibilities of arranging for a water supply, discussing the matter with the engineer, the doctors, and a gentleman of great experience in such matters who was staying in the neighbourhood. At length a plan was worked out after investigating several sources of supply (none nearer than about a kilometre). It was, of course, necessary to find out whether the local authorities would give permission for any such scheme, as the first scheme had to be given up owing to certain sanitary objections on the part of the préfet.

I had no manner of doubt but that this was the best way of helping these men—and that it was absolutely necessary. I had ascertained that the Belgian Government could not do it and that it was genuinely a case for outside help. I then went on to the headquarters of the engineers who would do the work, crossing half France to get there, and had a most interesting interview with the chief. He was most anxious to be able to do the work, as he agreed with me as to its urgent necessity. It was finally arranged that we should bring the water up the hill, put in a big cistern and pipes of hot and cold water with taps on each floor, and on each floor a douche bath for those who cannot go down and across the court for their bath. He also cleared up a point which had been worrying me—that is, that, supposing the hospital is only needed for, say, two years more (it is to be maintained there for six months after the end of the war), would all this installation have to be left for the proprietors? It appears that, by special arrangement, all the pipes and fittings can be removed to Belgium and used again in the repatriation work. This last point decided me to venture on pledging the Fund to the expenditure of 20,000 francs, or about £800. I have already received some special gifts amounting to about £150 towards this. If our subscribers could have spent that week with me among the men I have no doubt at all what would be the result.

An English nurse, Lady Baird, has been devoting herself to nursing the most sick among them. She has done marvels, and during last winter it was our privilege to send her many things that she found necessary for them. Among many other things we sent four dozen folding canvas chairs for use out of doors, and Lady Baird has herself added a number of cane lounges, has given the men shady straw hats and cotton umbrellas, and, on leaving Chambéry with me, she gave them two large tents to shelter them from the sun, and a cinema which will be the greatest joy to them. It is proposed to use it out of doors! Her place has been taken by a member of the household of the Duchess of Vendôme, the sister of King Albert. Before we left a villa was secured in the neighbourhood, and it is hoped that three English ladies will be established there in a few weeks, who will devote themselves to bringing a little home life into the lives of the men by inviting a number every afternoon to spend some hours with them, with games and music and tea. The Médecin Chef believes this will have an excellent effect on the morale of the community.

After the first difficulties of breaking the ice it was generally easy to get on friendly terms with the men and to hear their stories—and these were often pitiful enough. The men are of all classes; one I made friends with was a doctor of science who had intended to devote his life to scientific research, as he had private means, but the war came, and, in spite of delicate health, he joined up. Now he is paying the sad price of his patriotism, but without a word of complaint, though his position among his companions, who are not always well mannered, must often jar terribly, and the want of any privacy must be a sore trial. Another man I remember, bright-eyed and keen, unable to speak except in a husky whisper, spent every minute on a beautiful piece of embroidery he was doing for his marraine, who had befriended him throughout his imprisonment in Germany and sent him many welcome parcels. Scarcely any knew where their relatives were, or, if they did know, could not get news through now. One man was dying—one naturally wanted to write to his relatives, but nobody knows where they are.

One feels overflowing with sympathy for these men. It seems prosaic to say: "Then let us give them a water supply," but I am convinced it is the very best way, in this case, of showing our sympathy. I felt I was daring much in pledging the Fund to such an outlay, but the few people who have already written to me on the subject fill me with hope that I shall not appeal in vain. In the name of these poor tuberculous men, then, I say: "Give us the means to be clean ourselves and to keep our wards clean, and so help us to regain the health which we have lost." ROSE ALLEN.

MEMORIAL NOTICE.

MR. JULIUS HESS

THE congregation of Mill Hill Chapel, Leeds, has sustained a very severe loss by the death of Mr. Julius Hess, at the age of sixty. In company with several other members of the congregation, Mr. Hess went up to London on the 24th ult. to attend Dr. Hargrove's funeral. During his absence from Leeds he contracted gastritis, was confined to the house on the 26th ult., and died on the 3rd inst. The remains were cremated at Lawnswood Cemetery, Leeds, last Saturday, the service being conducted by the Rev. W. L. Schroeder, of Halifax. Mr. Hess had rendered good service to Mill Hill Chapel, and to the Unitarian cause in Yorkshire generally for many years past. In addition to serving on the Chapel Committee he had been for a number of years the hon. treasurer of the Yorkshire Unitarian Union, and a member of the Popple Trust. Keenly interested in music—both in regard to the Leeds Philharmonic Society, of the committee of which he was formerly a member, and in regard to the Leeds Musical Festival, being a member of the chorus—he was eminently fitted for the duties of the hon. secretary of the Chapel Choir Committee, which he kindly undertook during the absence on active service of Lieut. Jas. Boyle, the ordinary occupant of the post.

Mr. Hess came to England over forty years ago, and, in conjunction with his brothers, the late Dr. Adolph Hess and Mr. Bernard Hess, had built up a very successful business as oil distillers and refiners, having been for a considerable time the managing director of the firm. He was also, says The Yorkshire Post, a director of a concern at Queensbury (near Bradford), dealing in coal-tar products. Though of German birth—he had been a naturalised British subject for many years—Mr. Hess's sympathies were strongly pro-Ally, and he gave not merely a reluctant consent, but cordial sanction, to his only son joining the Colours in the early days of the War. Unfortunately Lieut. and Adj. Henry Hess was killed in action about twenty months ago.

Mr. Hess leaves a widow (who is also an active worker for the chapel) and one daughter. The Memorial Service at the chapel was conducted by the Rev. Dr. J. P. MacCarthy, of Mass., U.S.A., who, on his visits to Leeds, has usually been the guest of Mr. and Mrs. Hess.

A correspondent writes: "Quiet, unassuming, void of pretence, Julius Hess made for himself an unassailable place in the minds and affections of those privileged to know him.... He belonged to an artistic and musical circle which stood for high and worthy things in the life of Leeds. Himself a vocalist of no mean order, he took part in successive Musical Festivals from 1880 onwards. He enjoyed the acquaintance of Sullivan, Parry, Villiers Stanford, and other prominent musicians. For over thirty-five years he was an active member of the Leeds Musical Soirée, an old-established institution which embodied the best amateur musical talent of the city. He took part in some of the great Musical Festivals of the Midlands, and when the Leeds Philharmonic Society went abroad, he accompanied them. He stood as a fine type of the business man who by artistic and literary culture and by service redeems life from low levels. His gentle courtesy is for many a precious memory."

OUR ROLL OF HONOUR.

FURTHER additions and corrections have been received from Mr. Simeon Hall (Leeds), Mr. J. C. Burton (Leicester), and Miss A. A. Lucas.

THE PRESBYTERIAN COLLEGE, CARMARTHEN.

THE session was brought to a close on Wednesday, June 26, when the prizes were distributed in the presence of a numerous gathering by Miss Rosalind Lee, B.A., of Penmaen and Glanrhondda. Dr. Dawes Hicks presided, and was supported by Mr. Wilfrid S. Tayler and the Rev. H. W. Stephenson, two of his colleagues on the Presbyterian Board, and Mr. G. H. Clennell, the Secretary. The Principal reported that owing to the demands of the army the number of students had been reduced to twelve, one of whom, Mr. Emrys Jones, B.A., had recently sat for his first B.D. examination at the University of Wales. Though they were all graded as unfit for military service, the session had been remarkable for the absence of even trifling illness, and he noted the fact for the encouragement of those who, being of delicate or unsound constitution, devoted themselves to sedentary pursuits. Their conduct one and all had been admirable, and the examination results were very satisfactory on the whole. Indeed, some of the students had acquitted themselves with exceptional credit, and the two who were completing their course had qualified for certificates of honour.

The Chairman delivered an address (for the twentieth time, as he reminded his hearers), in the course of which, after paying a tribute to Principal Evans for the untiring solicitude with which he had guided the destinies of the College, and to the Professorial Staff, he dealt in a noble and optimistic strain with the tremendous crisis of the present time, and with those "great and enduring things" the vision of which we ought not to permit the conflict of arms to obscure. He did not ignore the black side of the picture—the strengthening of a great deal of evil, the demoralisation and "despiritualisation" caused by the abnormal conditions under which the nation was living—the contamination of constantly hearing, and desiring to hear, of the enemy being "mown down in masses," and the way in which we had grown accustomed to the thought of incredible sufferings on the part of the victim peoples driven from their homes. But their's was a religion according to which love or charity was the greatest of the virtues, and somehow and by some means they would have to break down the artificial covering of callousness and rekindle the natural, pure and simple feeling of human hearts. Speaking of yet another danger, that of an atmosphere being created "in which militarism can flourish, in which most of us may unsuspectingly become militarised in mind and feeling," Dr. Hicks emphasised the fact that it would require steadfast resistance, with the whole armour of God, to get rid of the idea that the greatness of England lay in her mere dominion, her commerce and material wealth, rather than in her readiness to sacrifice all for the sake of great causes, for what is right and just; in her passion for liberty and freedom, her magnanimity, and the pursuit of ideal ends. But there was encouragement to be drawn from the deep sense of human brotherhood which had grown up in the nation as a result of great trials and hardships suffered in common, from the way in which grievances had been laid aside by all sections of men and women in order that the best services might be given to the country in the crisis through which it was passing, and from the fact that the great religious ideals, that seemed formerly so difficult to bring to the ordinary consciousness, had been rediscovered by the experiences of these recent years. In the way men rushed to the colours at the beginning of the war, led by a divine compulsion, and sacrificing all to right the wronged and oppressed and obey the call of honour and freedom and justice, they must recognise the Christ-like thing, "something above the flux of sense and time," something which brought home to them the lesson of the Cross with a new significance. Finally, Dr. Hicks said, grief and sorrow had awakened aspirations which could only be satisfied by a real trust in God as the great Companion, by perfect confidence that at the fountain of life there is a Heart of Love.

Mr. W. T. Taylor, the Rev. H. W. Stephenson, Mr. Clennell, Prof. M. Lewis (Aberystwyth), Professors Moore and Morris Owen, Prof. Oliver Stephens, and the Rev. A. F. Mills also spoke. Speaking of Miss Lee, who distributed the prizes, the Principal said that in after years he felt sure it would be a pleasure to the students to remember that they had received their distinctions at the hands of a Cambridge mathematician who was the first of her sex to be in charge of a congregation in Wales.

THE FLORENCE NIGHTINGALE HOME.

A MEETING was held at Great Hucklow on Saturday last for the opening of the Men's Memorial Convalescent Home. Pending the possibility of erecting permanent buildings two houses have been purchased in order to make immediate provision for the men of our community who are in need of convalescent treatment. The proposal for the erection of the Home originated in the desire of the Manchester District Sunday School Association to provide some collective memorial of the large number of young men from its schools who had given their lives in the war. The proposal was submitted to the Sunday School Association (London) and the various district Associations, and two conferences were held at Great Hucklow in the autumn of last year. Delegates were present representing twelve Sunday School Associations, and after prolonged and detailed examination the proposal was unanimously adopted. It is proposed to raise a fund of not less than £10,000, of which at least £5,000 will be set aside as an endowment.

The Home is to serve in the first place as a memorial to those who have fallen and whose names it will preserve. But in place of dead stone it will be a living memorial, as it is to be designed and consecrated to the use primarily of those who have served and suffered in the war. As this need passes with the passing years the Home will take its place in the group of Convalescent Homes supported by our schools and devoted to their service.

A small company assembled outside the new Home and Mrs. H. Pilling (Manchester) unlocked the door and declared the Home open. After an inspection of the premises a meeting was held, Mr. H. J. Broadbent presiding. Addresses were given by Mrs. Pilling, Mr. T. Fletcher Robinson, the Rev. H. E. Haycock, and Mr. Pilling. The Chairman made warm reference to the services of the Rev. and Mrs. C. Peach, who are acting as hon. warden and matron of the Home, and Mr. Peach replied.

The Home is now open for the reception of guests—primarily men who have served in the war. Application should be made to the Rev. C. Peach, Great Hucklow, Buxton, to whom also subscriptions and donations may be sent. A first list of donations will be published in an early issue.

ON Wednesday, the Bishop of Chelmsford, presenting to Convocation a petition signed by 56,000 persons in defence of the Virgin Birth and bodily Resurrection, said a number of parochial clergy were in despair; some of the younger clergy were "tainted with a liberal theology."

MINISTERS' PENSION AND INSURANCE FUND.

THE Triennial General Meeting of the Fund was held at Essex Hall, London, on Wednesday, June 26. Dr. Carpenter, Chairman of the Board of Managers, presided. The Reports and Accounts for the years 1915-16-17 were presented and approved. The Chairman made reference to the extension of benefits conferred by the Fund made possible by the generous gift of the late Mr. Philip Holt; also to the serious loss sustained by the institution in the death of Mr. Howard Chatfield Clarke, who, from its foundation, had acted as Treasurer. Since his lamented death, his brother, Sir Edgar Chatfield Clarke, had kindly acted as Treasurer, and the Managers were glad to report that he was willing to accept the office as they desired. Sir Edgar was elected as a Manager to take his brother's place, and his appointment as Treasurer was confirmed. Dr. C. Herbert Smith and Messrs. R. P. Jones, F. W. Monks, and Harold Wade were re-elected as Managers, and Messrs. Sydney Martineau and Herbert B. Lawford were re-elected Auditors. The following resolution was moved by the Chairman, seconded by the Treasurer, and unanimously adopted:—

"That this Triennial Meeting of the donors, subscribers, beneficiaries and members of the Ministers' Pension and Insurance Fund records its gratitude to the late Philip Henry Holt of Liverpool for his generous legacy of £9,000, in addition to his previous gift of £2,000, and for the confidence with which he left the Managers free to apply it in developing the operations of the Fund as they deem best. In addition to other extensions it has enabled them to offer special advantages to ministers for insurance for the education of their children, and has thus greatly enlarged the usefulness of the Fund at a time when the war-strain on ministers' incomes has become exceptionally grave."

Cordial thanks were voted to the Chairman for presiding and for all his interest and work in connection with the Fund.

The Meeting of the Board of Managers was held on the same day before the General Meeting. Seven new applications were received and granted. There are already 75 ministers insured both for Pension and against death, 48 for Pension only. For Children's Education 23 insurances have been taken out under the ordinary tables, 17 special insurances are being assisted, including 3 for Children's Education, and small annuities are being paid to 2 aged ministers. Ten beneficiaries are in receipt of the Pension for which they made provision. The Draft Report for the last triennial period, to be presented to the National Conference, was approved. In view of proposals which are being considered by the Committee of the Conference for further assistance towards the Education of ministers' children, the Board expressed its approval of a supplementary Fund for this purpose being provided, so long as it was placed on the broadest basis, and expressed its willingness to co-operate as far as possible by utilising the resources of the Philip Holt Fund.

TOWN-PLANNING and housing schemes all over England would receive a new impetus if every large city followed the example of Birmingham, where a society to be known as the Birmingham Civic Society has just been founded. It is to act in an advisory capacity to the Town Council on town-planning and the structural improvement of the city generally, and the fact that it includes many artists among its members encourages the hope that the idea of beauty will influence public opinion more and more in the days to come.

THE MINISTERIAL FELLOWSHIP.

THE 19th Annual Meeting of the Ministerial Fellowship was held in Manchester on Wednesday, the 3rd inst., a large number of members being present. The President, the Rev. J. Collins Odgers, occupied the chair. Seventeen new members were elected, making a total of 245. No fewer than seven members had died during the year: a tribute of regret and sympathy was paid by a standing silent vote. A message of cordial greeting was sent to all Ministerial brethren engaged upon war service. The Annual Report showed a record of good work, and made interesting references to the operation of various funds in the interest of ministers—the Sustentation Fund, and the British and Foreign Unitarian Association being warmly thanked for the helpful war bonus given to 137 ministers. The report also showed what was being done by ministers in the way of War service, and what encouragement had been given to those of military age who had not joined the ranks to find some sphere of extra National Service on their own account. Representations had been made to the colleges on the question of the supply of ministers. Only four members had declared on the funds for benefit, and £71 3s. had been paid in Benevolent grants. The Treasurer's statement showed that the capital represented an outlay of £1,075; that last year's deficit had been cleared off and a balance of over £30 was carried forward on General Account.

The Rev. G. A. Payne was elected President, and the Revs. Dendy Agate, C. J. Street, and W. Jellie were re-elected respectively treasurer, secretary, and Secretary of War Service Sub-Committee. The Revs. J. C. Odgers, J. Ellis, and J. Evans were appointed on the committee, and Mr. A. E. Piggott and the Rev. H. E. Haycock were re-elected as auditors. Reports were given by the representatives of the Fellowship on the Ministerial Settlements Board, the Committee on the Supply of Ministers, and the Joint Committee for the Revision of the List of Ministers, and representatives were appointed for the coming year. A discussion took place on the subject of the education of ministers' children, and the following resolution was passed: "Having heard the report concerning the aid at present given toward the insurance of ministers' children for the purpose of education, and the proposal now under consideration to make still more generous provision to that end, this Annual Meeting of the Ministerial Fellowship would welcome the raising of additional funds to increase the benefits already secured by the Philip Holt Fund. Such educational provision should not be limited to pupils of a particular school or schools, but freedom of choice should be allowed subject, of course, to the approval of the managers of the Fund or Funds which give assistance." Various grants were made from the Benevolent Fund, and the balance was placed at the disposal of the Committee.

THE MISSIONARY CONFERENCE.

THE 58th Annual Meeting of the Missionary Conference was held on Thursday last in the Memorial Hall, Manchester, presided over by the Rev. W. H. Burgess, in his absence through indisposition of the President. After the election of officers as follows: President, Mr. H. G. Chancellor, M.P.; Treasurer, the Rev. J. M. Bass; Secretary, the Rev. W. T. Bushrod, the following resolution was submitted from the chair: "The members of the Missionary Conference of Unitarian Ministers and friends at their 58th Annual Meeting on Independence Day, 1918, in Manchester, send fraternal greetings to their brethren and co-religionists in the United States. They recall the fact that Dr. Richard Price and Dr. Joseph Priestley with other leading ministers and laymen in their churches warmly sympathised with the American cause in the struggle for political liberty in the eighteenth century. They trust that the fellowship of Britain and America in arms for the maintenance of international morality and the freedom of nations will cement the ties of friendship between the two peoples, and lay the foundations of a secure world-peace." The Rev. H. McLachlan seconded, and it was decided to send a copy each to the Secretary of the American Unitarian Association, and the Secretary of the General Conference. At the afternoon session papers were read by the Rev. J. Wain on 'A Plea for Domestic Missions,' and by the Rev. W. T. Bushrod on 'More's Inclusive Church.'

THE LIBERAL CHRISTIAN LEAGUE

THE Annual Open Meeting of this League was held at Sion College on Tuesday, June 25. The proceedings lasted over four hours, during which time the personnel of the attendance varied considerably. The President, the Rev. C. J. Sharp, Vicar of Ealing, and Mrs. Sharp, received the early visitors, assisted by his curate, the Rev. E. W. Lummis. The Rev. R. N. Pyke, the new Vicar of Christ Church, Crouch End, and Mrs. Pyke, and the Rev. Cavendish Moxon of Christ Church, Westminster, and Mrs. Moxon also assisted. After a Devotional Service, the Rev. H. H. Johnson of Evesham gave an account of his work in interdenominational social service. Reference was made to the enforced absence of the lady resident at the House of Service, who had been called to France to attend her sister, a voluntary nurse, and one of the victims of the bombing raid on the British hospitals.

The Public Meeting followed. After a hymn the whole audience rose on the invitation of the Chairman as a silent token of respect to the two late Presidents who had passed away this year, Dr. Glassey of Edinburgh in February, and Dr. Drummond of Oxford quite recently. The President's address was a manly plea for the cultivation of the liberal spirit in religious matters. The exclusion of women in the Church of England, for instance, had lost to them the valuable services of the lady who was to address them, and he claimed the right to pay heed to the teachings of science and give attention to present-day questions. What was Liberal Christianity? It was liberal, for instance, against the exclusiveness of Judaism, but a crystallised Christianity lost its freedom, and that we must strive to restore.

Miss Maude Royden practically took the same attitude, though from a different standpoint. Her subject was 'What is the Church for?' and by the Church she meant the whole of organised Christianity. The Church had been blamed for failure because it had not converted the world. But did it profess to be able to do so? On the contrary our Lord had said: "If I come shall I find faith?" But where religion existed it must permeate the whole of life. We fail when we endeavour to divide ourselves between the Church and the world; it cannot be done. As with the individual so with the Church; it must have a place for the whole of the interests of life if it wished to be successful.

A presentation of an address and various gifts, including £25 in treasury notes, was then made to Miss Alleyne, who for ten years has been Secretary to the League. Speeches appreciative of her work were made by Mr. R. Robinson, the Rev. C. Moxon, and Mr. B. Gray of the City Temple. Letters from the Rev. R. J. Campbell and the late Dr. Drummond were also read, and Miss Alleyne suitably responded.

The Rev. Dr. MacCarthy brought greetings from Dr. Eliot of Harvard, Dr. Wendte of the National Federation of Religious Liberals, and the President of the Universalist Churches; and addresses were also given by Lieut.-Col. Bullock and the Rev. R. N. Pyke. It was felt that these gatherings have a high value in providing opportunity for intercourse between persons attached to various movements for enriching and vitalising religious life among various branches of the Christian Church.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Belfast.—At a meeting of the general committee of the First Presbyterian Congregation held on the 7th inst., the minister, the Rev. H. J. Rossington, in the chair, it was proposed by Mr. T. H. Murray, seconded by Mr. John Mackenzie, and resolved: "That this general committee of the First Presbyterian (Unitarian) Congregation of Belfast strongly deprecates any representative of our body being authorised to attend the proposed International Conference of Divines, as suggested by the Scandinavian Prelates."

Belfast: Mountpottinger.—Second Lieut. Norman B. Munn, R.I.R., who is connected with Mountpottinger Church, and now lies seriously wounded in Dorchester House, Park Lane, has been awarded the Military Cross for distinguished gallantry in the field in France.

Great Hucklow.—The Rev. C. Peach entered on the pastorate of this congregation on Sunday last. There was an attendance of over 160 persons at the two services.

Leeds: Holbeck.—On July 7th the Sunday School Anniversary Services were conducted at the Unitarian Chapel by the Rev. W. R. Shanks, who was Minister from 1904 to 1915. The evening service was largely attended by parents, teachers, scholars, and friends, who were very glad to renew their acquaintance with Mr. and Mrs. Shanks. The choir was augmented by members from the Mill Hill choir, whose help was much appreciated.—Lieut. N. Gledhill, who prior to joining the Army was one of the Sunday school secretaries, has been awarded the Military Cross for gallantry on the field.

Leeds: Hunslet.—The church building was erected fifty years ago through the loving enterprise of friends who have nearly all passed away, and the congregation desires to show its gratitude by having a Jubilee Fund, which will be administered to the best advantage for the benefit of the church. A special service will be held, probably in October, at which the Jubilee will be celebrated, and the funds dedicated to the work for which it is intended.

Leeds: Mill Hill Chapel.—Copies of a sermon by the late Dr. Hargrove, entitled 'Last Words,' are being circulated with the Record for July. It was preached on April 22, 1900, before he started for America, and it was his wish, expressed at the time to a friend, that in case of no other arrangement being made by him, it should be printed after his death as his farewell to the Mill Hill congregation. He revised the MS., it appears, on November 22, 1909, and confirmed it in February, 1918, and also the request for printing it. At the end of twenty-four years at Mill Hill—to which he was to add so many years more of fruitful service up to his retirement in 1912—he felt that he would like to deliver such a message as he would utter if he knew that it was the last occasion on which he would be able to speak to them—a message which he might hope "many would remember and cherish when my voice will be heard no more."—The Rev. R. Nicol Cross, who is still with the R.A.M.C. in Egypt, has addressed another letter to his congregation, in which he writes with much earnestness of the war and what it means. He is particularly anxious that men and women should dissent from "every passion and purpose which appears to us to prolong disruption and perpetuate hostility," and urges those at home to play their part in trying "to prevent the material issues displacing the moral factors in the solution of this terrific problem."—The pulpit last Sunday at Mill Hill Chapel was occupied by Lieut.-Col. Bullock, whose subject in the morning was "The Triumph of an Ideal, or the Declaration of Independence." Referring to the wide field of thought opened up by the statement that all men were born free and equal, Col. Bullock pointed out that liberty was a relative term, and in a civilised community could only be exercised so far as it was not inconsistent with other people's liberty. For 142 years the Government on the other side of the ocean had been doing its best to put that principle into effect. Fifty years ago they had fought the greatest civil war in history in order to enforce it, and had demonstrated to the world that Republics could be so conducted as to give all the opportunities that could be given for the growth of religion, science, and art. Thus it was that diversities of opinion in religion were even more marked than in England, but all unworthy movements tended to die out. America, he added, had now broken away from the tradition that the waters kept her apart from the rest of the world, and before another twelve months had passed millions of men under the Stars and Stripes would be marching with those under the Union Jack to secure the freedom of the world.

Leicester.—Successful Sunday School Anniversary Services were conducted at Narborough Road Church on Sunday, June 30, in the morning and evening by Mr. Edward Owen Greening, of Lee, S.E.; in the afternoon an address was given by Mrs. Elliott.

Leytonstone.—The Sunday School and Guild of the Leytonstone Free Church have again been showing their practical interest in the ragged children of the Hoxton Market Mission, the hon. superintendent of which is Mr. John Burt, father of Miss Maud Burt, the superintendent of the Leytonstone Sunday School. On a recent Thursday evening they produced a musical play in the large hall of the Mission, the thirty performers having been carefully trained by the Guild president (Mrs. Frank Bonner), Miss Ella Rush, and Mr. Burt, junr. The entertainment, which was largely attended, and was a great success, was given in aid of the Fresh Air Fund, instituted to provide country holidays for the poorest and weakest of the little ones in the worst parts of London. During the evening a little Hoxton cripple presented a bouquet to Mrs. Bonner in appreciation of the work the Leytonstone Guild had been doing for Hoxton. The secretary of the Guild is Mrs. Sheridan Stevens, whose husband, one of our lay preachers, is now serving with the R.G.A. in France.—Some official changes have recently been made at Leytonstone. Miss Hilda Rush has been elected secretary of the Sunday School in the place of Miss Dorice Peterken, who is now joint secretary of the Church, with Miss Burt in place of Mr. Noel. Another series of musical services for wounded soldiers was completed on Sunday evenings at Whipps Cross Convalescent Hospital. The service was held in the grounds, Mr. Bonner giving the address, as well as arranging the musical programme.

Liverpool Domestic Mission.—On July 3, the Rev. Jos. Anderton, who retires after thirty-nine years' service, and Miss Anderton were presented with gifts and an address signed by about three hundred friends. Particulars will appear next week. The Rev. C. P. Scott, Missionary Fellow, who is joining the Army, also received a wrist watch in token of warm appreciation and good wishes.

Liverpool: Ullet Road.—As announced in the July Calendar, arrangements have now been completed for the temporary amalgamation of the Ullet Road Church and the Ancient Chapel of Toxteth, in order that each minister, at his own request, may undertake service with the Y.M.C.A. in France. Representatives of both the churches concerned met together and proposed a scheme of amalgamation which has been unanimously approved by the Council and congregation of each church. Commencing on Sunday, August 4, the morning service will be held at the Ancient Chapel, and the evening service at Ullet Road. There will only be one service, therefore, at each place of worship for some months to come. Mr. Redfern will probably cross to France about the middle of July, but the services at Ullet Road will be continued as usual, morning and evening, until the first Sunday in August. For the time being there will not be two congregations but one, the members of which will have the unique privilege of being in possession of two places of worship, very different in style, but pervaded by the same atmosphere of sanctity and spiritual devotion. In a letter to the members of his congregation the Rev. Lawrence Redfern says: "I feel sure that the members of the congregation as a whole will give the temporary arrangement to which I have referred, their whole-hearted support. Our two churches have stood through good and evil days for the same high ideals of the religious life, they have striven to unite a fearless search for truth with an intense spiritual life, and from that union has been born a power for good, which has given the Ancient Chapel and the Church at Ullet Road an honourable place in the religious life of this city. We want to hand on that tradition not merely unimpaired, but, if possible, enlarged and enriched, whatever the difficulties and whatever the hindrances we have to encounter." During the absence of the Minister Mr. C. Sydney Jones will edit the Calendar.

Midland Sunday School Association.—The Annual United Service for the Birmingham schools was held on Sunday afternoon, June 30, at the Old Meeting Church. The service was conducted by Rev. S. Mossop of Handsworth, the address being given by the President, the Rev. J. Morgan Whiteman. On Saturday, July 6, the Association arranged, in conjunction with the Midland Guilds Union, a teacher's conference at Kingswood Chapel. Mr. Herbert Crabtree, of the Old Meeting, gave a very thoughtful and helpful address on "Child Consciousness and Religion."

Stockport.—Pte. Albert E. Reese, Hood Batt., R.N.D., formerly a member of the men's class at the Unitarian Church, of which his brother-in-law is secretary, has been awarded the Military Medal. Lieut. Robert S. Goodall, 8th Yorkshires, has been mentioned in despatches for meritorious services.

Walsall.—"Rose Sunday" was observed on Sunday last at the Unitarian Church, and at the morning service the Minister, the Rev. H. Warnock, preached on "War and Beauty." At the evening service reference was made to Independence Day. Special anthems were rendered.

OUT OF THE HEART OF THE STORM.

Twelve Sermons preached at Rosslyn Hill Chapel
Hampstead, and Manchester College, Oxford.

BY

Rev. HENRY GOW, B.A.

The sermons are written by one who believes with President Wilson that "right is more precious than peace," and that no personal sorrow or loss should discourage us and turn us from our firm resolve to overthrow the Prussian autocracy. They are written too in the growing confidence that faith in God and in the supremacy of Love has become more and not less possible and real through the conflict and agony of recent times.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

All letters and manuscripts for the Editor should be sent to 13 Bream's Buildings, Fetter Lane, London, E.C.4. They must reach the Editor not later than Wednesday morning for publication the same week.

MR. FISHER'S success in getting his Education Bill passed without division on its third reading on Tuesday in the House of Commons deserves warm recognition. The House itself, and the nation generally, may also be congratulated on the fact that a Bill of the kind, with its enormous potencies over the future of our people, has found a place in the legislation of a period so filled with harassing questions of a very different kind. It would seem to show that there is an earnest realisation that the care and discipline of the rising race is no less urgent a task than that of national self-defence, that it is indeed no small part of self-defence, properly considered. Mr. Fisher, as we all know, has surrendered more than he and some of us like in the desire to get the measure passed; but no one can doubt that if, as we trust, it becomes law this session, it will prove a great landmark in our domestic history. The principle of continued education beyond ordinary schooldays, and the compulsory provision of medical treatment, to name no other points in the Bill, indicate a great stride in advance.

THE King has expressed the desire that the fourth anniversary of the declaration of war "shall be observed with special solemnity as a national day of prayer." A letter on another page, from the Rev. Joseph Wood as Chairman of the National Conference Committee on Public Worship, and the Rev. James Harwood as Secretary of the Conference, urges the importance of the subject on our churches. If our churches and all others in the land could succeed in drawing people generally to share in humble seeking for and submission to divine guidance, as well as to a new consideration of "the great ideals with which as a people we entered on the war" a truly beneficial result might be expected. But will they so succeed? The appointed day being Sunday we may expect somewhat better things than appear to have occurred in the United States in connection with President Wilson's appeal similar to our King's. The Rev. C. J. Dutton of Troy, N.Y., says: "We had a day of prayer. Hardly anybody observed it. Very few churches were opened, and it was not thought of by most people." We must do better here.

THE friends and admirers of the late Dr. Charles Hargrove will be interested and gratified to hear that the portrait to which we referred a few weeks ago has been purchased by subscription of the members and friends of the Executive Committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association for presentation to Essex Hall, as a permanent token of the esteem and affection in which he was held by his colleagues. The artist, Miss Minna Tayler, is generously giving the purchase money to the Belgian Fund.

ACCORDING to the Rev. J. T. Sunderland, whom many of us remember as for a time resident in London, there is a silly rumour in circulation in the United States to the effect that Sir Rabindranath Tagore, the famous Indian writer, is a "Pro-German"! Mr. Sunderland writes in The Christian Register that, so far as he knows, there is no evidence whatever that Tagore is or ever has been in sympathy with Germany's military or political aims, or that he has ever had anything to do with German activities, during this war or at any other time. He believes the story originated in San Francisco and is really "one of the many fakes" got up by the sensational papers. He knows Tagore well, since visiting him in India twenty-three years ago, and saw much of him on his recent tour in the States. Besides personal intercourse to go upon, Mr. Sunderland has periodicals regularly from India which print practically everything Tagore writes, and he says: "I have never heard or seen a single word from his lips or his pen that had the slightest tinge of pro-Germanism." That he, like many other educated Indians, and not a few members of Parliament, desire a generous measure of Home Rule for India, similar in principle to that enjoyed in other parts of the Empire, is true; and possibly "honest ignorance" may have linked this desire with the notion that he sympathises with our enemies; but "as between British dominance of India and German dominance, he unequivocally and strongly prefers British."

ABOUT eight or nine years ago, Mr. Robert Nixon, formerly of Corby, Northamptonshire, but at that date resident in London after life in the Colonies, called at Essex Hall to make inquiries as to our Association and its work. His sympathies had apparently long been in our direction, and his visit led to a generous bequest of £1,000 to the funds, with a tenth part of his residuary estate. He died in 1916, and his estate being now finally administered has yielded a total benefit to the Association of £2,542 after the deduction of legacy duty.

WE have to bespeak the patience of correspondents whose letters have been long deferred, and of others whose letters are unavoidably crowded out altogether. May we remind our friends that brevity is always desirable, so far as may be consistent with the subjects discussed; they should also notice our rule not to insert anonymous letters. Two gentlemen have written this week, Mr. E. F. Lewin of York and Mr. J. C. Warren of Nottingham, animadverting on the tone and matter of our Notes on the aliens' question last week. The latter writer recalls many errors, as he deems them, committed by THE INQUIRER in past years, and desires that its expressions shall be in keeping with its religious character. The former, adding his courteous reprimand to the writer of the Notes, gives information as to the numerous spies at large in his city. We may assure these and all other correspondents that their several points will receive our respectful consideration.

A CORRESPONDENT asks where the complete poem, 'Each in his own Tongue,' by Prof. W. H. Carruth, to which we referred last week, is to be obtained. Very likely some of our readers can name an English publisher; our own copy came from America, where the author's poems were issued in a collected form in 1910, under the title 'Each in his own Tongue, and Other Poems.' It may be a convenience to some if we reproduce the verses here as revised by the author; we trust he would heartily consent. They are as follows:—

A fire-mist and a planet,—
A crystal and a cell,—
A jelly-fish and a saurian,
And caves where the cave-men dwell;
Then a sense of law and beauty,
And a face turned from the clod,—
Some call it Evolution,
And others call it God.

A haze on the far horizon,
The infinite, tender sky,
The ripe, rich tint of the cornfields,
And the wild geese sailing high,—
And all over upland and lowland
The charm of the goldenrod,—
Some of us call it Autumn,
And others call it God.

Like tides on a crescent sea-beach,
When the moon is new and thin,
Into our hearts high yearnings
Come welling and surging in,—
Come from the mystic ocean,
Whose rim no foot has trod,—
Some of us call it Longing,
And others call it God.

A picket frozen on duty,—
A mother starved for her brood,—
Socrates drinking the hemlock,
And Jesus on the rood;
And millions who, humble and nameless,
The straight, hard pathway plod,—
Some call it Consecration,
And others call it God.

At a meeting of the Directors of THE INQUIRER Company held on Thursday, June 27, 1918, it was unanimously resolved: "That the Directors with great regret feel themselves compelled to accept Mr. Drummond's resignation as editor of THE INQUIRER, as from July 31, 1918; and they offer him their sincere thanks for his devoted services since his appointment in 1909. The Directors desire to record their sense of the high literary standard which Mr. Drummond has maintained in the paper, and of the breadth of view which has been combined with a keen interest in the life of the churches with which it is most intimately concerned. They desire to express to him their appreciation of the strong position which he has taken in the present great struggle for freedom, and international right and justice. They wish him all success in the new work which he is now undertaking."

PASSION AND PRINCIPLE.

To some of our young men the call of the war came, as it did to Rupert Brooke, as "God's hour," with which they were "matched." With exalted gratitude, strange but sincere, they accepted it, rejoicing that the sleep of use and wont had been ended in so marvellous a waking. To others this appalling and horrible thing has seemed little else than a huge mass of physical and moral ugliness, and especially to men face to face with the crude facts. For such men, we gather, the only way of escape from complete disgust and revulsion is often in strict attention to the quite minor details of their work day by day. That kind of relief, too, has been sought by a good many minds away from the battle-front. The monstrous happenings, resulting in a sacrifice—far from ended yet—of millions of lives, have been thrust by such into the background of their consciousness; men protect themselves against going sheerly mad by converging attention on the duty of the hour, on plans of "reconstruction," on some immediate piece of philanthropy, and the like. Few of us, probably—though we have met one or two—are capable of the high emotion of those young poets.

But other high emotions sometimes break down all fences of commonplace routine, and at present, if we do not mistake, the tide of feeling is very full. The fourth anniversary of the declaration of war, now in sight, draws the mind irresistibly to a renewed sense of the tragedy; and we must needs let our feelings express themselves. We may no longer drug ourselves with the anodyne of simply "carrying on," for we are men and must pay with suffering the price of a humanly sensitive nature. Let it be so. Rather let us pay the price to the full than subside into brutish apathy. Rather let us desire the troubling of our spirit to its depths, if only we may gather fuller forces into our life. May it not be that in this flood of passionate feeling the hope of a renewed and re-invigorated human nature is to be found? We must hold that it is good for a man to feel intensely, even if there is some risk in the experience; if only he be master of his feelings, the stronger they are the greater his life will be all through.

Among the passions that have been deeply stirred in us is that of Pity. Some people, it is true, appear little affected by it; presumably their capacity to conceive and enter into the pains and woes of their fellow-creatures has been left undeveloped, or is submerged by selfishness. If it were not so, if all good citizens, in all lands, did but realise the pangs and losses and heart-breakings that have been going on during these terrible years, surely their Pity for mankind would swell to such a height that the hinderers to the world's peace would be swept away and more humane governors of the nations put in their place. Yet were that attempted, it could only be well done if wise thought as well as strong passion grappled with the problem. A blind life nourished within the brain is not for man, nor can it do man's task on the earth. The passionate Pity that finds an expression in "pacifism," as it is called, is a noble emotion; and every religious-minded person will wish for more of it. But this and every other elemental energy imperatively needs the guidance of reason. Man's destiny is not to be achieved without the co-operation of every faculty in him, and the flood of even a noble emotion may carry one to fresh disaster for lack of controlling principles. This war means, to us who support it, an attempt, cost what it will to our sense of Pity, to establish order in the earth, to embody a reasoned Law among nations; and that is a task demanding a full exercise of instructed judgment.

On the other hand is the passion of Wrath. At one time it burned its fiercest in Germany and darted its tongues of flame chiefly against England. And when Lissauer wrote his abominable 'Hymn of Hate' our characteristic chuckle at the mere silliness of such a performance only added fuel to the fire. As this fourth year draws to its awful end there seems to be some evidence of a waning of hatred there, while here it waxes stronger, for reasons all too obvious. If an unbiased observer of the facts could be found—and we should certainly not look for him among the superior persons whose chief virtue seems to be an inverse patriotism delighting to depreciate the land of their birth—such a detached mind might tell us to remember that at an earlier date the Germans, most of them, thought they had as good evidence against us as we have against them. To any such reminders, should they come, our ready reply is that there is no comparison between the fraudulent "facts" served up to the German public and those undeniable incidents which stain with indelible infamy the record of Germany in this war.

Against such incidents a righteous Wrath arises, and we trust ever will arise in the heart of man. But righteous, and far from ignoble in its due place, as is this vehemence of our spirit, it must like all our emotions subject itself to the instructed judgment, the self-possessed discernment of the reason. Otherwise we shall be caught in our turn imitating in some way of our own the folly of the German's egregious 'Hymn.' Englishmen are credited with a special dislike of looking ridiculous. They are also credited with the worthier quality of a desire for fair-play, a sense of equitable proportion in all their public conduct. If "God's hour" has indeed brought us deeper and more powerful emotions than we as a nation ever knew before, we have good cause to be grateful—so long as we preserve a well-balanced mind, which is, indeed, the necessary condition of success in the career of nations as of individuals. Any weakening as to principles will not find compensation, but quite the reverse, in the greater pressure of our emotions. Plato's charioteer did well to harness powerful steeds to his chariot; he did well also to keep a firm grip of the reins.

'PARIS THROUGH AN ATTIC.'

THIS is a "true story,"* equally fascinating in itself and wholesome for these troublous times. It tells how a young English couple, with a capital of £140 and no prospects, determined to go to Paris and study for two years at the Sorbonne—and how they did it. "We were rich in much real wealth—energy, health, love, even some knowledge—and we were not afraid. So we married." They had to face the problem "How to live on £70 a year now, and how to live at all after." Never, perhaps, since William and Dorothy Wordsworth set up housekeeping at Dove Cottage, has the like been known for the wisdom that the world counts folly, and the courage that consists in simply taking the blessings that prodigal opportunity offers us:—

And was the cost so great? and could it seem

An act of courage, and the thing itself
A conquest? who must bear the blame?
Sage man

Thy prudence, thy experience, thy desires, Thy apprehensions—blush thou for them all.

"The real wealth that was ours, France helping," answered the financial problem, and this book is primarily and ostensibly a detailed account of how the answer was worked out, with the ingenuity, the checks, the resourcefulness, and the glee of the energetic, healthy, and enamoured "researcher" who is determined to get the answer and to get it right; and incidentally, but quite organically and inevitably, a paean to 'France' arising from a heart overflowing with gratitude to her for her loving and noble "help," given so ungrudgingly to the young strangers.

The present writer reproaches himself for not having written these lines a week or two ago. If he had done so, surely, within the circle of the readers of THE INQUIRER, every one would have given every one else a copy of the book "against" France's day, July 12. But it is not too late, after all, and it is a very desirable thing to do. For closely as we are knit to France, we do not understand her. Those of us who happen to have strayed through French villages and country lanes and tried their luck in French cottages, or who have been lucky enough to spend a week or two in the Quartier Latin with artistic friends, have got as far as catching some chance gleams of the charm and witchery of France and emancipating themselves from slavery to the impressions of the Parisian drama and literary tradition, but they know very well how little they understand the "real" France after all, or the place that the Parisian literary tradition (which is real, too, in its way) takes in it. This book will help them to love and to enjoy much that we Englishmen could not emulate or adopt, however much we might wish to do so, and to understand better, and therefore judge in a wider, wiser, and more generous spirit not a little that may have alienated or offended us. Never since it was first struck, laden with such stupendous issues, has our entente with France received a richer contribution to its "cordiality" than is given in this book.

Here we meet M. Charles le Gros the butcher and understand how the French retail trader's "ability to feel a genuine enthusiasm for his wares" makes him not only delightful but endlessly helpful. We meet Madame Weisman, married to a silent but observant Alsatian, and we understand that the French "housewife of the lower middle classes is no amateur at her work, but a skilled professional."

"Madame could be wrong; she could never be stupid. She could make mistakes; she could never mismanage." We see something of the Frenchman's and especially the Frenchwoman's intellectual aloofness and disinterested pleasure in analysing a situation that closely concerns them, but in the development of which, them a kind of fatalism, they have no intention of interfering. We meet the young lady who when told by her father that it is time she married and when asked what her views on the subject are, answers at once: "I should like a Professor," gets one, and is content. We understand from Mrs. Edwards (and surely she knows!) that the maiden had no particular professor in her mind but was considering the situation and not the individual. And we meet the Professors themselves in the lecture hall, and the students in the café, and the young man to whom the relations of our married couple are utterly incomprehensible and incredible, but who looks forward resignedly to "regulating himself" when the time comes, and will probably do so.

But I must stay my hand. Paper is dear and even the generous INQUIRER grudges it.
P. H. W.

CORRESPONDENCE.

JOSEPH PRIESTLEY.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—I have read with much interest Mr. Bloor's able letter on Dr. Priestley; with much interest, but with a smaller measure of sympathy. The writer seems to have said about the utmost that can be said in depreciation of the great man, who dared, amid the sneers of his scientific brethren, still to profess an enthusiastic faith in Christ and Christianity; who dared at the very same time to expose himself to the uttermost rage and spite of bigoted Christians who would have it that he was an unbeliever and a disloyal man. "Priestley never grasped the significance of his own ideas." Most unquestioningly so. I believe it. It is the very glory of the man. His thoughts came to him as simply and naturally as the parables came into the mind of Jesus. I believe, too, that he never fully estimated the value of his own courage and patience, his own unstudied goodness of soul.

If any one asks what have I to do in all this, the reply is that I had to break through all the prejudice of my previous training before I could have any conception of his character and worth. I read answers to Priestley, very clever answers in their way, too, almost as early as I read anything. Fletcher taught me to answer him, before I had the slightest idea what things were to be answered. And the first definite notion of his doctrine was given to me in this form: "Priestley believed that at death the soul sleeps with the body, and thus one might say, Here lies J. P., body and soul." It was news to me and seemed to make him more and more unintelligible. It was not till I read Priestley's own letters in Rutt's biography and afterwards various tracts and longer writings by Priestley that I began to realise how much I had almost lost. From him better than from most men a man may learn what Huxley meant when he demanded "scientific integrity" as a necessary quality for a teacher; from him better than from many one gets some idea of what Jesus meant when he called the "pure in heart" blessed. How much more was involved in his own discoveries, scientific and theological, than he had ever reckoned he could not know.

He knew that a man must be himself, that he must not pretend to accept a weak and unsatisfying argument because it comes from St. Paul; and he must not hesitate to make himself a laughing stock even to scientific men if he cannot expound what he means otherwise, and this, whether he is speaking of "dephlogisticated air" or the resurrection of the dead.

It was a lovable man God sent among us when he sent Priestley. As my friend V. D. Davis has reminded us that it is by the grace of God that we know Jesus Christ, so it is by his grace that we have been further helped by Joseph Priestley, and are privileged at times to remember him again with gratitude undiminished.

J. RUDDLE.

WHERE IS THE RELIGIOUS CENTRE?

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—Mr. Davis and Dr. Mellor in their friendly discussion seem to represent diverging lines of thought, whose ultimate issues lie far apart. But as one who believes with Mr. Davis that "there is only the one eternal, ever-present Spirit, the God and Father of us all," I also agree with Dr. Mellor that Jesus is much more than "an accident of history." Just as the Law was described as a Schoolmaster to bring men to Christ, so Christ may be regarded as a Revealer and Leader to bring men unto the Father.

If the word mediator were not so hopelessly associated with the idea of an advocate pleading with an angry God on behalf of an alienated humanity, I should feel that it was the most appropriate one to apply to Jesus pleading with men to accept their divine sonship in all its fullness. Other mediators there are, no doubt, who in varying degree fulfil a similar function—all good men and women, and perhaps especially little children, all inspiring thinkers, the beautiful in nature and art. But while gratefully recognising all we owe to these others, we must acknowledge that for us who stand in the line of the Christian tradition, as a matter of historical fact, Jesus Christ holds a unique position as a representative of God to men and a quickener of the Spirit in their hearts and lives.

It may perhaps be true that for a long time to come the great mass of men will require a more concrete object of worship and faith than the Infinite Father, whom no man hath seen or can see. And so, to a large extent, the worship and supreme love of Trinitarians are centred on Christ, in spite of his own call to worship the Father. But that is no reason why Unitarians should not make a fuller use than I fear they often have made of the religious helpfulness of Christ as Leader, Inspirer, Exemplar.—Yours, &c.,

JAMES HARWOOD.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—Has not this recurrent controversy now gone on long enough—if one may ask it without offence? In this long-drawn out agony I have, personally, often looked to your paper for its help in emphasising, in a very noble manner, the ideal issues of the struggle. It is greatly disappointing to find so much of its diminished space filled by a contention which seems (to me at least) inappropriate to the times. Circumstances have brought it about that I spend my days within hearing, so to speak, of a universal wail of anguish—anguish for the most part wonderfully borne—Rachel weeping for her children because they are not. Those not in contact with it may not realise it, but that agony is there in the silent masses outside, and the greater for the silence. It has the effect of making such contentions as this seem unreal and trivial. A discourse I fortunately heard recently on 'The

* Paris through an Attic. By A. Herbage Edwards, Author of 'Kekemono, Japanese Sketches.' J. M. Dent & Sons. 1918.

Unembittered Spirit" seemed to me worth all controversies because it came home to our present necessities of soul. No amount of controversy is likely to induce thoughtful and sincere people to exchange the "religious centre" which they have tested both intellectually and emotionally for themselves, for that argued by another person. His intellectual certainties and emotional experiences cannot be forced upon me as against my own; his intuitions (if I may venture on that dangerous word) cannot be substituted for mine; still less can they be made mine because they are his, for I do not recognise them or him as the final religious authority. Weak and plastic minds, blown about by winds of doctrine and anxious to be told how they must believe, are no doubt open to influences of this kind; but these are, presumably, not the minds that enter on this controversy in your pages. The more mentally capable the person the less likely is he to change his most darling convictions at the bidding of another. Then why argue? On n'y passe pas. The community you represent, however loosely-knit its component parts, has usually agreed (as I understand) on insistence on individual mental freedom in this intimate sphere of being, the religious life. I cannot see, then, that its individuals have any grievance against "Free Catholicism"—or even, if a congregation comes to desire it, real Catholicism in the Roman sense. Equally I cannot see that "Free Catholics" have any right to lament the blindness of those whose background of religious being is what they call theistic. To the Free Catholic this may be "dark, dark, dark, immeasurably dark" like Samson's blindness; yet it was Samson who brought down the pillars of the house. Samson too might have seemed hopelessly out of the stream of modern religious life. But he did his bit. Such a claim (of out-of-date-ness) is only the old claim paraphrased of orthodoxy, brought up to date from past penalties to "modern" or future ones: "You ought to believe so-and-so under penalty of—old fageyism." Lastly, I am convinced, and in this I do not speak without data, that this controversy is absolutely without interest to that great and young army on whose shoulders rests the future of the world.—Yours, &c.,

POINTS FROM CORRESPONDENTS.

MR. E. BASIL LUPTON (Cambridge, Mass., U.S.A.) says the Rev. E. W. Lummis "almost nervously strives to adapt his modern faith to the language of the old creeds, and seems to be fearful to step beyond the words suited to a stage of intellectual development that belongs to the past. The Unitarian, Free Christian, or Free Thought method," he says, is "able to test critically the authority of the Biblical writers and the creeds of the Church"; hence, being tested, our faith "can be regarded as scientific and sound."

THE REV. FRED HALL (Blackburn) quotes Dr. Mellone's question at the Provincial Assembly—"What about a League of the Churches?"—and pleads for common forms of praise and prayer, to be compiled by a committee representative of different shades of thought among us. By securing uniformity of worship we should, he believes, add "a deeper fellowship to our already cherished freedom."

MR. A. DIXON (Oldham), referring to 'The Religious Centre' discussion, describes a youthful experience of his. Having wearied of the periodical recitals of the Athanasian creed he turned to his New Testament, only to find, not the subtleties of that creed, but the affirmation of "the Father" being "the only true God," and that of the glorious humanity of Jesus. His venerated vicar, who had quoted the spurious text I. John v. 7, 8, in support of the doctrine of the Trinity, told him that "belief in the Trinity was no more difficult than belief in God at all," to which, lad as he was, he made the obvious reply that simple belief in a Heavenly Father was congenial to the human mind all the world over, while these subtleties had only been evolved in a particular age of the Church. The "typical manhood of Jesus," he maintains, it is the main duty of our denomination to affirm; and he suggests that greater attention should be given to "the natural psychic possibilities of our common human personality."

DENT'S 'MEDICAL DICTIONARY.'

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—I personally wish it were the custom for authors always to be allowed full right of fair reply to reviewers, but I think Dr. Drummond takes rather needless exception to my not unfriendly, but necessarily short criticism of his book. With regard to the derivation of the word "botulism" I do not deny that it is derived from the word botulus, a sausage, but the term is a bad one, and words change their meanings with added knowledge. Plumbism means lead poisoning and nothing but lead causes it, and alcohol always causes alcoholic poisoning; such terms are scientific, but there is no specific sausage poisoning. Osler* says "similar attacks have been produced by ham" and if poisoning occurs it is bad fish, pork, beef, or whatever the sausage is made of, that explains the poisoning, not the skin by which the sausage is covered nor its sausage shape. "Sausage poisoning" is, therefore, too short and also an inadequate explanation of the term botulism. I still think the article on 'Infant Feeding' does not give sufficient space to the physiology of why breast feeding is better for mother and child. There were many other comments I also could have made but the last sentence of my review was, I believe, a fair and kindly statement of my position.—Yours, &c.,

J. LIONEL TAYLER.

AUGUST 4.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—We beg to commend to our churches the King's desire that Sunday, August 4, "shall be observed with special solemnity as a national day of Prayer." It is not proposed that the National Conference should, as on two previous similar occasions, issue a form of Service. Ministers and congregations, in complying with the King's desire, will doubtless use such special prayers as appear appropriate for the day, and will probably be glad to avail themselves of some of the prayers previously issued by the Conference which they have at hand.

It is earnestly hoped that our Free Churches, in common with all other churches, will unite in a Service which gives national expression to the great ideals with which as a people we entered on the war.—Yours, &c.,

JOSEPH WOOD, Chairman of the Committee on Public Worship.

JAMES HARWOOD, Secretary.

July 16, 1918.

We are glad to hear that Lieut. Percival Godding, minister of our congregation at Ballyclare, who was reported missing on June 19, has been able to communicate with his friends. He is quite well, though a prisoner in German hands.

MEMORIAL NOTICES.

THE REV. H. C. HORSLEY, M.A.

WE mourn the death of one of the youngest of our ministers, early fallen on the field of duty at home. It was not the fault of Harry Charles Horsley that he did not fall on the field of war. He volunteered for enlistment in the early days, but was rejected for a physical defect which would probably be neglected now. At that time he was a student at Oxford. Born in March, 1889, he passed from school into business life, but under the influence of the Rev. Rudolf Davis, of Gloucester, he formed a desire to enter the ministry, and in 1909 began his studies at Lincoln College. Graduating in 1913 he proceeded to Manchester College for the three years' theological course. In 1916, when he was enrolled M.A., he took charge of the congregation at Acton, and last year was called to the important post of minister to the Moss Side Church, Manchester, where he entered on his duties on the first Sunday of this year. His frank and gentle demeanour won for him warm friendships at once, and in his preaching deep earnestness was combined with an evident reality of spiritual experience and a directness of moral appeal which augured well for a career of sustained and fruitful service. It has been ordered otherwise. He passed away on Monday after a short illness—influenza followed by pneumonia—leaving a wife, also dangerously ill we regret to hear, to whom he was married in 1916. With her, as also with the church so sadly bereaved, sincere sympathy will be felt.

MISS PRITCHARD.

THE death, on Tuesday, of Miss Emma Pritchard removes one who in former years was a zealous and influential social worker, and whose interest in all progressive effort was sustained through recent years when kept to her home by infirmity. Amongst other beneficent labours she was for many years secretary of the C.O.S. committee in Islington, and infused her diligent service with a kindly sympathy not always found, we fear, in officials of this society. She was most affectionately regarded by many who in this and other ways benefited by her help. At the age of 80 she has followed into rest her younger sister, Marian, ("Aunt Amy") who died nearly ten years ago.

THE LATE DR. DRUMMOND AND DR. HARGROVE.

THE Committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association at their meeting held at Essex Hall on July 10, Mr. Richard D. Holt, M.P., President, in the chair, reverently passed a resolution of appreciation of the life and work of Dr. Drummond, and of sympathy with his widow and family in their sorrow.

The resolution was as follows:—

"That this Committee, on behalf of Unitarians generally, desire to express their deep regret at the death of the Rev. Dr. James Drummond, preacher of the Annual Sermon in 1906, a learned and devout scholar whose writings are known far and wide, a revered educator of many of our ministers, and himself an able and zealous defender of our faith and principles, whose beautiful character and noble piety were an inspiration to all who knew him; and they beg respectfully to tender to Mrs. Drummond and her family sincere sympathy in the great loss they have sustained."

At the same meeting of the Committee of the Association the following resolution was passed:—

"That the Committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association place on record their high appreciation of the many and valuable services rendered by the late Rev. Charles Hargrove in support of the principles and faith of Unitarians at home and abroad. President, preacher, member of Committee, delegate to America, Australia, and New Zealand, Dr. Hargrove's gifts of learning, thought, and labour were generously bestowed upon the religious community to which in the full maturity of his powers he gave his unqualified allegiance; while his courage and steadfastness in the pursuit of truth and his gentleness and personal charm made him a beloved and inspiring colleague with whom to be associated. The Committee would tender their respectful sympathy to his widow, son, and three daughters in their sorrow."

'THE OPEN TRUST MYTH.'

At a meeting of the Unitarian Historical Society held in the Memorial Hall, Manchester, on July 3, Mr. Albert Nicholson of Hale presiding, a paper was read by the Rev. W. Whitaker of Platt Chapel on 'The Open Trust Myth.' In the course of his interesting lecture Mr. Whitaker criticised the view generally accepted amongst us in the past two generations that our forefathers left their chapel deeds "open" in the interests of theological progress. It was a fascinating theory which we should like to find true because it would argue a progressive spirit in the Puritans. But there was nothing to show that chapel trusts were left open on any ground of principle. As a matter of fact, while the Puritans may have been inclined to liberty, they loved religion more than liberty, and would never have been content with a mere negative freedom from creeds. It was an anachronism to read into the writings of the Puritans and Presbyterians of the seventeenth century the nineteenth century notions of development. The two points with which the founders of the early chapels, both Presbyterian and Independent, were mainly concerned in their trust deeds were the danger of the revival of persecution and the possibility of a measure of comprehension. The Toleration Act satisfied them as being sufficient to secure the orthodoxy of their ministers. In some cases, as at Platt, the requirements of the Toleration Act are expressly referred to in the trust deed which makes specific what others imply. Later on the issue foreshadowing the principle of the Open Trust, as it is now understood, was raised on the point of non-subscription to creeds in connection with the Arian controversy. Our fathers gradually reached a true principle and laid the foundations for religious reunion in the far future. But in doing so there was some loss. By allying themselves with the Rational and Arian movement they cut themselves off from the Evangelical revival. They were not originators or creators in the field of religion. The world would not be content with an indefinite or negative freedom which could not in itself be a basis for religious fellowship. Mr. Whitaker illustrated his paper by references to the writings of the Rev. Alexander Gordon, and the deeds of the Presbyterian and Independent Chapels in Hull.

A vote of thanks to the lecturer was moved by the Rev. G. A. Payne, seconded by the Rev. C. J. Street, and a brisk discussion followed in which the Rev. H. McLachlan, the Rev. E. D. P. Evans, the Chairman, and Mr. Oliver Knott of the Baptist Historical Society took part. On the motion of the Rev. W. H. Burgess a cordial vote of thanks was accorded to the Chairman. It is hoped to present the paper in permanent form in the Transactions of the Society.

A LITTLE SUMMER SCHOOL IN WALES.

MANY circumstances conspire to make it impossible for some of our ministers who would dearly like to do so to take advantage of the opportunity for study, conference, and congenial companionship so wisely offered by our colleges in Oxford and Manchester, and the writer knows how several Unitarian ministers have quietly chafed under these baffling conditions. A couple of weeks ago, however, an opportunity was offered to the ministers of the South-East Wales Area for a week's conference and social intercourse, which was readily taken advantage of by nearly the whole of them. The meeting took place through the thoughtfulness and generosity of Miss E. Rosalind Lee, who invited the ministers to spend a between-Sundays week at her hospitable home on the Gower Coast, and conferences and recreation were blended in such a way as to make the time spent there most pleasant and profitable. The work of each day began with a brief devotional service, and conferences of great practical value were held on a variety of subjects, e.g., 'Our Denominational Problems,' 'The Greatest Need of our Churches,' 'The Best Methods of Sunday School Work and Organisation,' and 'The Social Implications of our Gospel.' The problems of a wise denominationalism, of the future of the ministry and its equipment, of the development of the missionary spirit among our people, of the fostering of the devotional side of worship, of the linking up of the Senior Sunday School with the Church, of the relation of the Church to the social welfare and the industrial life of the people all came up for discussion and for informal conference.

In view of the great and impending importance of the subject, it was decided to make public the general consensus of those present on the question of the college preparation for the ministry of the future. This was to the effect that the college curriculum should be so far reorganised and readjusted, in view of the changed conditions of the times, as to secure the inclusion and treatment of such subjects as the following: Elocution; Music, in practice and in application to church and Sunday school; at least an outline knowledge of the facts of the cosmic and world history and of the primitive history of mankind; Anthropology and Comparative Religion; the legal, political, and social system in relation to the Church, and to the work of the Church; Systematic Sociology; General Political Philosophy, and Political Economy; Psychology, with special reference to religious psychology and to the psychology of childhood and of adolescence; the principles and technique of education in application to the problems of Church and Sunday school; Business Method and Organisation. The time for parting came all too soon, but work at home was calling, and if the guests left the hospitable roof with regrets, they also carried with them memories which will not soon be effaced. Renewed in body and soul by friendly intercourse, they will take up again in lonely outposts, and with fresh hope and courage, the sacred work to which they have dedicated their lives.

THE Local Examinations and Lectures Syndicate, University of Cambridge, is holding another Summer Meeting in the Long Vacation from Thursday, August 1, to Tuesday, August 13 inclusive. 'The United States of America' will be the main subject of study, and Dr. Page, the American Ambassador, will deliver the inaugural lecture. This should prove an interesting course, and we hope the great success of former summer meetings at Cambridge will be repeated.

AN INTERDENOMINATIONAL CHURCH.

THE opening of 'The Church of All Nations,' in Boston, U.S.A., is a remarkable indication of the spirit of brotherhood growing up between men of various nationalities and religious beliefs in America. 'The Morgan Memorial,' says The Universalist Leader, "originally financed by Unitarians but administered by Methodists, has been for a long time an important centre of Applied Christianity. Its religious services have attracted all sorts and conditions of men from the polyglot population surrounding it. This work has proved increasingly helpful, and recently generous friends have provided funds for the beautiful church, now completed, and dedicated as 'The Church of All Nations.' It has an interdenominational staff, headed by Dr. E. J. Helms, to whose prophetic leadership the whole institution is largely due. Other members are: Baptist, the Rev. Austen K. De Blois; Congregationalist, the Rev. George A. Gordon of Old South Church, represented by the Rev. Albert Dunning; Episcopal, the Rev. Elwood Worcester of Emmanuel Church; Methodist Episcopal, Bishop E. H. Hughes; Presbyterian, the Rev. W. W. Iliffe of Brookline; Swedenborgian, the Rev. James Reed, represented by the Rev. H. Clinton Hay; Universalist, the Rev. S. H. Roblin; Unitarian, the Rev. Thomas Van Ness. At the dedicatory service two hundred and fifty people, representing twelve races, united with the church."

AN ULLET ROAD BOY'S EXPERIENCE.

THE following experience of an Ullet Road boy, Private Arthur Bibby (6th S.W.B.), who is now recovering from a severe wound, is worth recording. The part of the line in which Private Bibby was placed was subjected to a heavy bombardment, after which the enemy delivered an attack. The order to retire was given, "and our section made for a road which led into a village, but about a hundred yards up the road I received a bullet wound which passed under the shoulder-blade and pierced a portion of the lung." Private Bibby was forced to lie down by the side of the road, and shortly afterwards an advance party of the Germans came along delivering their attack. The first wave swept past, but of those who followed, one stopped to give Private Bibby a cigarette, another took off his wounded foe's equipment and made it into a pillow for his head, and put his water bottle within reach, while a third made a pad out of his field dressing with which he staunching the wound. As he turned and followed his comrades, he assured his patient that the Red Cross would come soon. A German Red Cross Orderly came up shortly afterwards, and was engaged in dressing the wound when the order came for the Germans to retire before a British counter-attack. "About ten minutes after the last had passed down the road our lads, counter-attacking, were creeping up the road, and it was not long before the R.A.M.C. lifted me on a stretcher and took me to the advanced dressing station." We are glad to record Private Bibby's testimony of gratitude to a company of unknown but chivalrous foes.

A NUMBER of Unitarian Conscientious Objectors at The Settlement, Dartmoor, have, week by week, during the last twelve months, met together for fellowship and worship in one of the prison rooms. The nearest Unitarian Church is over seven miles away and is out of bounds. The men were recently visited by the Rev. T. P. Spedding.

At a meeting of London Free Church men and women held in Bloomsbury Central Church on Wednesday, July 16, to protest against Regulation 40D, D.O.R.A., the following resolution was passed: "That this meeting of Free Church men and women views with sorrow and indignation the return to the discredited policy of the Contagious Diseases Acts in Regulation 40D, Defence of the Realm Act; and calls upon Parliament to insist on the immediate withdrawal of this Regulation, which constitutes a serious menace to the safety of women, encourages men in the practice of vice, and weakens the moral sense of the community as a whole."

THE managers of the Great Meeting, Leicester, are anxious to secure the services of a social worker, man or woman—an ex-officer in search of this kind of work is suggested—to take charge of a Boys' Sunday school and allied institutions. The salary offered is £120 to £150. Applications may be made through the Rev. Dr. Rattray, 24 Stoughton Drive North, Leicester.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Blackpool: Waterloo Road.—The Annual Field Day of the Waterloo Road Unitarian Sunday School took place last Saturday at Roskell's Hill Farm, South Shore, on the High School field, kindly lent by Mr. and Mrs. W. Rawson, the former a past President of the church. Field games and athletic sports occupied some hours, and after tea prizes were presented by Mr. Arthur Wilkinson, Joint Superintendent and Hon. Sec. of the Church.

Bradford: Broadway Avenue.—The close of the ministry of the Rev. W. R. Shanks at Broadway Avenue and Idle has been marked by the presentation of gifts to him and to Miss Shanks, teacher of the Young Women's Gymnastic Class. Mrs. Northin presided at the social meeting when the presentation was made, and Miss N. Scruton spoke in terms of warm regard for Mr. Shanks, whose thoughtful and instructive discourses in face of depressing conditions have been much appreciated. Mr. Shanks in his reply alluded to the peculiar difficulties they had had to contend against, the chief of which had come upon them as a result of the war, and urged all present to maintain their loyalty and stand fast till the conflict was over.

Bridgwater.—The first of a series of historic rambles in Bridgwater, arranged by the Workers' Educational Association, was conducted on Thursday evening, July 11, when an address on Admiral Blake, to whom the evening was devoted, was delivered by the Rev. C. E. Pike, Minister of the Unitarian Church, in the Council Chamber. Various portraits and relics of Blake were inspected at the Free Library, in addition to his statue on the Cornhill, and a visit was paid to other places in the vicinity associated with his name.

Brighton.—Owing to the serious conditions created by the war it has been thought advisable to postpone the Public Meeting which had been arranged to welcome the Rev. R. H. U. and Mrs. Bloor to the town, and at which Dr. Jacks of Manchester College had kindly promised to speak. The congregation are hoping to hear Dr. Jacks in Brighton at some future date. Mr. Bloor has been asked by the Y.M.C.A. to undertake a six weeks' engagement to speak and lecture in the military huts at Winchester, and he will be engaged in this work during the latter part of August and all September. After Sunday, September 8, however, he will occupy the pulpit at Brighton as usual. During the autumn Mr. Bloor intends to arrange some special Sunday Afternoon Meetings for the discussion of religious and social problems. It is thought that these meetings will help the church to become a centre of useful activity, and that they will deepen the impression Mr. Bloor is making on the church and town. Though his ministry has been of short duration, there is evidence of substantial progress in all departments of the life of the church. The preacher for July 21 will be the Rev. W. C. Bowie.

Godalming.—After the service at Mead Row Chapel last Sunday evening a presentation was made to Mr. Ernest W. Verstage, who has been called up for military service and will be leaving about the end of this month. Mr. Verstage, who had taken his usual part in the service as organist, was completely taken by surprise when, after the last voluntary, the minister, the Rev. Priestley Prime, explained why the congregation did not leave the building, and read the words of the testimonial which accompanied the gifts. The presentation was then made by Miss Wallis and Mrs. J. Baker on behalf of the many subscribers. Deep feeling was manifested by the whole congregation, which included visitors from Ward Street Church, Guildford. As the men of the congregation have responded in large numbers to the military call more and more of the work of the church has been cheerfully undertaken by Mr. Verstage, and he will be seriously missed from the congregation.

Halifax.—The death has occurred recently of Mr. George Shillito, a very old member of Northgate End Chapel, in his 82nd year.—Lieut. Stanley G. Dyson, of the Royal Air Force, who was wounded on March 30, died on June 1, 1918. A young man whose life held the promise of fine things, he was a teacher when war broke out at the Milton Road Council School, Cambridge. He enlisted in the R.A.M.C. in March, 1915, and after a very varied experience was transferred to the Air Service in 1917. He obtained his commission in December, 1917, and passed to France in March of this year.

Highgate.—On Sunday morning, June 14, a tablet, which had been set up by his children and grandchildren to the memory of the Rev. Thomas Elliot, was unveiled in the Unitarian Church. The Rev. A. A. Charlesworth, in the course of his sermon, expressed the pleasure of the congregation at having this permanent reminder of the spirit and work of one whose memory is honoured by all who knew him for his character, influence, and the services he rendered. Mr. Charlesworth said the tablet would be regarded as the inspiring record of an unfinished life, now continued elsewhere, and concluded by quoting the following sentences from the inscription on the tablet: "For many years a worshipper and worker in this church and Sunday school, a lay preacher, and afterwards minister of the Unitarian Church, Southend. He loved God, and in that greater love was included the love of nature, and of truth, and of his fellows. Those who knew him best loved him most." The tablet is the work of an old friend and a present member of the congregation, Mr. W. W. Jago.

Leeds: the late Mr. Julius Hess.—The Rev. W. R. Shanks, Secretary of the Yorkshire Unitarian Mission, writes: "I regard it as one of the outstanding privileges of my ministerial life to have known the late Mr. Julius Hess and to have had the opportunity of associating with him in the official work of the Yorkshire Unitarian Union. Every one of the cordially appreciative references to his fine character and services in the notice in THE INQUIRER of last week were fully merited, and I crave permission to add two more words. His generosity was worthy of recognition for on numerous occasions, and in quiet, gracious ways known only to a few, he rendered help to churches and individuals; and as Treasurer of the Yorkshire Union for ten consecutive years, during which period the second County Bazaar was held, he kept the accounts of the Union in a most admirable manner. The passing of Julius Hess in this time of sorrow is, indeed, an irreparable loss to our churches in Yorkshire."

Liverpool Domestic Mission.—As briefly reported last week, the Rev. Joseph Anderton, after thirty-nine years of devoted service, has retired from the Liverpool Domestic Mission. On Wednesday, July 3, a large number of workers and old members of the Mission gathered together to say farewell to their much loved Missionary, and friends from far and near sent words of greeting. The Rev. H. Shaen Solly sent a letter telling how he had been instrumental in bringing Mr. Anderton from Padiham to Liverpool. Mr. Frederic Robinson presided over the meeting, and spoke with deep emotion of the invaluable work which Mr. Anderton had done in Toxteth. He was followed by many other speakers, some of whom had grown up in the Mission; one and all testified to the permanent quality of Mr. Anderton's work and to the abiding love which he had inspired in the hearts of the people. Every one voiced the wish that he would frequently revisit the scene of his labours. The Rev. J. C. Ballantyne expressed his deep regret that he was not to have the comradeship of Mr. Anderton at the beginning of his new charge. The Rev. Neander Anderton spoke of the pleasure it gave him to be present at such a meeting, and said "I am proud of my father." Mr. W. Coventry, with a few appropriate words, presented a chair and a canteen to Mr. Anderton, and to Miss Anderton a silver tea service and tray. In addition to these gifts, a book containing some three hundred signatures and an address was presented; from this we quote a few sentences: "When first you came amongst us, your energies had for some years been devoted to the fashioning of tablets and monuments in stone and marble. Henceforward your acceptance of the call meant that here you would be fashioning in very truth the hearts and lives of men. For forty years you have so laboured as to help, strengthen, and inspire all among whom you have lived and worked in this neighbourhood. How many hold you in grateful remembrance and deep affection will be known neither to us nor to you, but only to Him Who knoweth all hearts. Many have cause to say of you as of another servant of the Lord: 'Surely he hath borne our griefs and carried our sorrows.'" In a brief reply Mr. Anderton thanked his many friends for their expressions and tokens of affection; he recalled his long and happy partnership with Mr. Lloyd Jones, and spoke of his deep regret at leaving the Mission where he had laboured with joy for so many years.

London: Peckham.—In connection with the Unitarian Church a Garden Party and Sale of goods remaining over from the recent effort was held on July 13, with the gratifying result that the whole of the cost of repairs to church and school have now been met.

Mansfield.—Owing to unforeseen circumstances the Rev. A. H. Biggs has asked to be released from his engagement to take up the ministry of the Old Meeting House. He holds a war-work position which will keep him in London, and we understand his services will still be occasionally given to the congregation at Ilford, where he has ministered during the past seven years.

Nantwich.—The Sunday School Anniversary Services were held at the Unitarian Church on Sunday, July 7, the preacher being the Rev. D. J. Evans of Chester.

Newcastle-on-Tyne.—A meeting of the Women's League was held in the Church of the Divine Unity on Monday, July 15, under the presidency of Dr. Lillie Johnson. Schemes were suggested for work during the winter session, and volunteers were asked for to help in War Relief and Infant Welfare work in the city. It was also decided to form a study circle. Mrs. Alfred Hall then addressed the meeting on the subject of 'Practical Idealism,' and by her own enthusiasm for high ideals set a standard for the members to aim at when she has entered upon her new sphere of work in Sheffield.

Newton Abbot.—The Anniversary Services were held at the Unitarian Church on Sunday last, July 14, the date of the opening of the present building in 1901. The service in the morning and the Young People's Flower Service in the afternoon were conducted by the Rev. Frederic Allen, the Rev. Joseph Worthington of Torquay preaching in the evening. The services were well attended, particularly the evening service.

Norwich.—The Rev. Margaret B. Crook, B.A., entered upon her six months' ministry at the Octagon Chapel on July 7, when the Sunday School Anniversary Services were held. Miss Crook preached to good congregations, and there was a vigour, freshness, and simplicity about the services which should augur well for a period of renewed activity for the church. On Monday evening, July 8, a well attended Welcome Meeting was held in the Martineau Hall. The Rev. J. B. Robinson of Hapton offered a dedicatory prayer. Mr. A. M. Stevens, who was in the chair, in giving Miss Crook a cordial and sincere welcome on behalf of the congregation, said the appointment of a lady minister was in nowise the result of a desire for novelty, but was made in the belief that Miss Crook was the person best fitted to fill the position. Mrs. Mottram gave a warm welcome on behalf of the institutions connected with the chapel. A pleasing feature of the meeting was the very friendly and broad-minded spirit shown by the three ministers representing other denominations in the city who took part in the proceedings—the Rev. J. J. Brooker of the Old Meeting House, next door to the Octagon Chapel; the Rev. A. Bromley of the United Methodists; and the Rev. Eric J. Lawson of Magdalen Road Congregational Church. Mr. W. Buston, Secretary of the chapel, read cordial letters which had been received from other ministers unavoidably absent. Miss Crook, in replying, said the transition from a college of which Dr. Martineau had once been Principal, and which was still dominated by his influence, to a church so full of Martineau tradition seemed singularly natural. Since the classrooms of the one were open to women it was most fitting that the pulpit of the other should be so too. Norwich did not stand alone in making such an appointment, but was in line with the City Temple and King's Weigh House Chapel. In Oxford also the example of Manchester College had been followed by its neighbour Mansfield College, and several women in the last few years had taken the Theology Schools in the University of Oxford with a view to missionary work and lay preaching in Wesleyan and other bodies. In thanking those ministers who had so kindly welcomed her into the Free Church life of Norwich Miss Crook said she should value the proffered friendship all the more in that, from the point of view of the Unitarian ministry, Norwich was a somewhat isolated post. She appealed to the members of the congregation to assist in filling the chapel and to meet the winter's work in good heart.

Pontypridd.—We understand that the Rev. T. Eric Davies is resigning the pastorate of the Morgan Street Unitarian Church in the early autumn. This will mean the severance of a very happy connection of three and a half years' duration.

Wakefield.—After many months of uncertainty notification has been received that Private Claude M. Lawrence, of the Royal Scots, who belonged to Westgate Unitarian Chapel, reported missing last August, must now be presumed dead.

York.—The Rev. Marshall B. Skelland, who was recently appointed to the ministry of St. Saviourgate Chapel, has been appointed Assistant-Master of Archbishop Holgate's Grammar School, and commences his duties in September.

* * THE INQUIRER welcomes items of news likely to be of special interest to its readers, and is ready to pay for such news when accepted by the Editor, the scale depending upon its importance and suitability in form and matter for insertion. OUT OF THE HEART OF
THE STORM.

Twelve Sermons preached at Rosslyn Hill Chapel
Hampstead, and Manchester College, Oxford.

BY

Rev. HENRY GOW, B.A.

The sermons are written by one who believes with President Wilson that "right is more precious than peace," and that no personal sorrow or loss should discourage us and turn us from our firm resolve to overthrow the Prussian autocracy. They are written too in the growing confidence that faith in God and in the supremacy of Love has become more and not less possible and real through the conflict and agony of recent times.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

All letters and manuscripts for the Editor should be sent to 13 Bream's Buildings, Fetter Lane, London, E.C.4. They must reach the Editor not later than Wednesday morning for publication the same week.

THIS week has deepened the gratitude of every thoughtful person in the land for the whole-hearted help of our American allies. The counter attack in the Marne district, which if not a decisive event—though it very well may prove so—is certainly a most important one, giving a much needed renewal of confidence to our people, owes much, obviously, to the freshness and energy of the Americans who took part in it. By this time the enemy has good cause to modify his low estimate of the military significance of the United States. But our debt to that great country in the matter of the food supply is no less striking. We have it on the highest authority that our food supply, concerning which the gravest fears were at one time held, is henceforth assured; and this, be it noted, we owe chiefly to voluntary restriction by consumers in the States. When we recall once more our deep obligations to their President and other men of leading for the splendid democratic ideal they have set in front of us all, we may well feel that here are services for which no thanks avail.

THE world has supped so full of horrors that the execution of Nicholas II., the ex-Tsar, has caused but a ripple of public comment. Perhaps hesitation to accept the report as true has had a share in the matter; but when all is said that may be as to the tragedy of such a death men's minds have far more extensive woes to contemplate, and more searching anxieties than relate to the fate of an imperial family. The brief memoirs that have appeared may have to be corrected in a less crowded age, when history, no longer in the making, may be elaborated at leisure. The present impression is that of a weak man, trying to grasp a sceptre too unwieldy for any but the strongest, and surrounded for the most part by unworthy and self-seeking men to whom real patriotism was unknown.

POSSIBILITIES in Russia are bewilderingly various, and immensely significant to the world at large as well as to the many millions that till eighteen months ago were nominally under one government. But, for that matter, there are possibilities nearer home about which thoughtful people are becoming almost daily more deeply concerned. How much longer can the Austrian Government prevent the discordant elements in the Dual Monarchy from flying asunder? Just how far will the German Socialists, soldiers or workers, continue to acquiesce in Kaiserism; and when will the approach of defeat, economic especially, compel the mass of the German people to declare for a real democracy in the Empire? And, not to draw out the list too far for the maintenance of a steady mind, what is the precise meaning of the temper among British workers that, even in an urgent crisis of the war, not only threatens but puts into force a strike such as this week's?

THE House of Lords has quickly given a second reading to the Education Bill, and unless some unforeseen action arises on the part of the powers that can never reconcile themselves to letting the poor be taught "more than is good for them," the measure ought to become law before Parliament rises. The Archbishop of Canterbury, who as a Church politician is sagacious enough to see that Anglican interests are well protected by the Bill, drew attention on Tuesday to the curious fact that there would almost seem to be a connection between war and education. A hundred years ago, in the time of the Napoleonic struggle a first really popular system of schools was attempted. In 1870, when the Franco-German war was in progress, School Boards were set up; and it was in the Boer war period that Mr. Balfour's Act was passed. Mr. Fisher's Act, as we trust it will be ere long, would be a good one indeed, if it were as much better than all its predecessors as our war is vaster than all other wars known to man.

MR. BEN TILLET, who is nothing if not vigorous, years ago expressed very emphatically the view that alcoholic drink was a menace to the national well being. Of late, however, he has, with equal warmth, espoused the cause of the publican, or at least of the publican's chief customer, the worker who is fond of his beer. Sir Harry Johnston, a vigorous writer too, but a man of very great observation as a traveller, especially in the less civilised countries of Africa, has taken a strong stand on this question. Speaking not as a teetotaler, for he is personally in favour of light beers as a beverage, though as a loyal subject he has abstained on the invitation of the King, he denounces the drink as an enemy to the Empire, as witnessed in particular by its appalling consequences in creating bad blood amongst different races. He is amazed that we in this country do not realise the strong feeling roused in Canada and the United States by the tempting facilities afforded here to young soldiers from across the sea. Like Dr. Estlin Carpenter, he confesses that in regard to temperance he is a fanatic; and like many others of us, he cannot understand the culpable sluggishness of our Government in its policy on a subject of such vast importance to our race.

THE Wesleyan Conference last week at Manchester showed one thing at least, viz., that in spite of train and food difficulties a large and successful assemblage can come together and do its business. Perhaps our own Conference may be encouraged by the example set. As to the doings and sayings of our Wesleyan brethren there might be much to profit by, could we but find space for discussion. We can only note one or two outstanding features. First, we observe that the President, the Rev. Samuel Chadwick, who is a manly man evidently, called upon the churches to "Revive, or Perish," and by revival he meant the old thing. If modernism had any converting power let it appear, but he doubted it. There is an undeniable shrinkage in membership, explain it as one may, and Mr. Chadwick seems to be as good a representative of the old thoughts and ways as is likely to be found. We shall look on his efforts, if not with intellectual sympathy, certainly with fraternal desire for great spiritual successes.

WE notice that the maintenance of a more adequately paid ministry came up for discussion, and once more the long deferred hope of reunion among the various Methodist bodies was brought forward. Here, too, we may refer to the kindly greetings to the Conference given by Anglican representatives, and to the renewed expressions of a mutual interest which, if religious bodies were as practical as they ought to be, should long ago have resulted in closer co-operation. But while the branches of the same Wesleyan family are so slow to forget their lines of cleavage we fear the fusion of episcopal and non-episcopal groups is still far away. The subject of training for the ministry also engages this group of Christian churches, and schemes are being elaborated for the better utilisation of their teaching resources. A promise of £50,000 by two laymen toward founding a Methodist College at Cambridge is a welcome indication of enlightened as well as generous policy. But one wonders if a Cambridge atmosphere will really foster the type of thought that the worthy President values so highly.

WE referred recently to the death of Mr. J. Allen Baker, Chairman of the British Council of the World Alliance for promoting International Friendship through the Churches. Fuller tributes to his memory appeared in The Friend of July 12. Sir Willoughby Dickinson, who was intimately associated with him, both in Parliament and in his work for international peace, says: "The fact that he was a member of the Society of Friends gave him peculiar facility in harmonising discordant elements. I have known occasions when he seemed to be the only person present who was able to offer a prayer acceptable to a dozen denominations. He served a Master whom he knew all men could serve whatever might be their language or their methods of service; and, careless of creed or dogma, he led the way to a truer perception of the love of Christ that passeth knowledge than could be gained by any study of rubric or of homily." Another writer refers to Allen Baker's genius for friendship, and quotes Mr. Asquith's tribute, in a letter to Mrs. Baker: "I honoured your husband not only as a friend....but as a model of single-minded and self-sacrificing devotion to public duty."

THE Library Service Secretary to the American Expeditionary Forces (47 Russell Square) informs us that Prof. Carruth's poem 'Each in his own Tongue' is published by Messrs. Putnam, London address 24 Bedford Street, W.C.2. We hear it is contained in an anthology, 'Underneath the Bough,' gathered by Theodora Thompson, and published at the Bodley Head, Vigo Street, W. Another correspondent kindly sends us a copy of the poem completed by the inclusion of six additional verses; they are all filled with the same suggestive thought as those quoted in last week's INQUIRER, though in our judgment not all equally felicitous with them,

THE WEALTH OF YOUTH.

YOUTH has itself, its incomparable self. To the mature belong fibre and habit; to the old the harvest of experience. To be young is usually to have little money and less prudence—defects which the elders, if fortunate, have somewhat remedied. But the elders, however fortunate, suffer from one defect that is irremediable. They have lost the freshness of the morning, the song of spring, love's earliest flowers, life's fine zest of adventure. This is the quality that the years of war are straining out of the nation's very life current. In the branches the sap that mounted the stem long ago still pursues its course, and, be it confessed, to good purpose. None but a fool can fail to acknowledge the fine work done to-day by our hardy veterans. To some the call means a welcome extension of opportunity, alike of service and of earnings; to others it implies sore and continued strain just when, in ordinary conditions, there would be relief and relaxation. When the story of our time is fully told it will include no unworthy record of many who are well on in years.

And yet these are just the people who will most readily admit that there are some things in which they cannot but give second-rate service. Splendidly they "carry on," and their young folk away at the war would hasten to thank them and reassure them in their capacity to hold on to the end. So may it be; but as a matter of honest stock-taking we know but too well that the absence of the younger elements of the national life, whether temporarily as we devoutly hope, or final as we must frequently mourn, is beyond all calculation a very serious loss. It affects every department of life where originality and abounding energy is wanted, commercial and industrial, as well as artistic, literary, and religious. Not for nothing have observers noted a "dead line" beyond which the preacher or poet has nothing new to say, and when the touch, long familiar, has no longer any vitalising thrill. The prophet may ascend Horeb and strike the rock, but as Matthew Arnold sadly declares: "The mount is mute, the channel dry." It is in considering this prevalent rule, whatever notable exceptions may occur, that we feel most poignantly the tragedy that has befallen our world.

A great part of humankind's most valuable resources, in all the leading countries of the world, has already gone or is now vanishing. Not in vain—our aching hearts protest—let it be not wholly in vain that this sacrifice has been surrendered to the Minotaur of war. Our lads, beloved and admired for what they were, dearer and more illustrious in the prophetic hopes that clung about them, cannot, we must maintain, pass wholly and fruitlessly away. Their noble aims, their self-sacrificing valour and manly affection, will live in all history to come, and will stir the finest impulses of the lads of future generations. Yes, even these unspeakable griefs and pains shall every one be, in the divine alchemy, transmuted into inspiration and heart-purifying challenges, under the influence of which mankind at large will attempt and will achieve greater things than we have yet dared to dream.

But if this is to be the case, those who have any share of the wisdom of maturity, as well as all the younger men who may survive this war plague—a plague worse than that which in Egypt destroyed only the first-born—will see to it that the nation's wealth of youth, the life of its children, lads, and girls, shall not be squandered by neglect or wasted to serve the selfish aims of ignorant and deluded worshippers of money and marketable goods. "There is no wealth but life," said Ruskin long ago, and his generation was slow to accept the saying. If our generation still regards it as the expression of visionary sentiment we are not worthy of our dead, we are mere traitors to the living who form the one hope of our country's future. If we honestly subscribe to it as a truth as valid as the law of gravitation or the necessity of breathing, will there not be some new and persistent attempt to shape our conduct by it—in particular, by helping these young lives, in work, play, companionship, and worship, to grow in healthful vigour and beauty, body and soul? Si jeunesse savait, we sigh; but the greater pity, not unmixed with shame, is when vieillesse knows, and knows quite well, but acts as if it did not matter after all.

A MESSAGE OF HOPE.

MR. ALGERNON BLACKWOOD's book 'The Promise of Air' (Macmillan, 6s. net) ought to have been called 'The Airy Way,' and probably it would have been if that title had not been annexed some years ago by Mr. George Dewar. For it is the Airy Way that it seeks to describe—the trackless path which a bird may take "from Primrose Hill to the suns of Abyssinia," and which the soul itself unhesitatingly pursues when "like an unbodied joy whose race is just begun" it, too, rises into the pure element which is its home with a song of rapture and exultation. But where Mr. Dewar deals with the perfection of flight as an expression of physical energy, though he does so with the ardour and imagination of a poet, Mr. Blackwood regards it as the symbol of a spiritual deliverance, an extension of consciousness into that region of unity and harmony where the one-ness of life is realised, and all things flow in movement beyond the power of man to confine. This sense of awareness in regard to the larger rhythm, the wider outlook, and the deeper comprehension of beauty that is finding expression in many ways at the present time, in spite of our preoccupation with war, is, of course, the keynote of the author's message whatever he chooses to write, and those who, ignoring his accent of conviction, talk merely of his charming flights of fancy misread him altogether. His books are prophecies, nearly all of them; but surely 'The Promise of Air' approximates more closely than anything he has yet given us to the overwhelming realities which are dawning upon the mind of civilised man. The élan vital of Bergson, the "divine wisdom" of Maeterlinck—creative power and piercing intuition transcending the laborious processes of the intellect, which comes up afterwards to consolidate and stabilise the triumphs they have won—these are the materials out of which he weaves his wonder tales; and in the story of Joseph Wimble and his winsome daughter, who shares with the birds the spontaneity, audacity, fearlessness, swift instinct and ecstasy that are a part of bird life, he tries to explain to us many things of which psychologists and physicists are dreaming, but which it is not possible, as yet, to make intelligible to the multitude. Everything is seen in terms of the Air Age which he believes has already begun (astronomical facts being called in to support the theory for the benefit of those who study such things), and the airman, with "new nerves, new courage, new outlook upon energy" is helping to prepare us for its marvellous possibilities. The terrors of the present time, shattering, cataclysmic, at which the heart shudders, seem like "the opening and stirring of multitudinous huge wings." Democracy, also, with "powerful, magnificent eagle-wings," conveys the sense of sublimity as of a flock of birds flying in their thousands at the command of a collective impulse. "A great aerial movement has begun, an etherealisation, a spiritualisation of life," and the soul of man is being quickened by emotions and ideals which have "the supporting drive of the entire universe behind them."

How all this is worked out in the story which Mr. Blackwood has woven—with what beauty of language, fanciful charm, and delicate humour the theme is developed we cannot hope to convey adequately. Certain passages in the book, especially those describing the movements of birds, read like lyrics translated into prose which have not lost the accent of poetry in the process, and not infrequently we follow with a sharp catch in the breath the author's earnest attempts to snare in a net of words the joy that fills him to overflowing. No wonder that Mrs. Wimble, standing badger-like in the doorway of the "hole" which conventionality and a dull mind had dug for her to house in, watched so anxiously the happy faces of her husband and Joan as they talked of intimate things which they had experienced together with that lilt in their voices that is so disconcerting to commonplace mortals. But in the end the bird of happiness touched her, too, with its wings, though her spirit only turned vaguely in its sleep at the caress, for it is not easy to wholly escape the contagion of souls lit with the consciousness of a supreme truth. That is one of the things Mr. Blackwood is at pains to show; but what he seems to be chiefly insisting on is that, behind and beyond the present world-conflagration (which he only mentions indirectly), infinite possibilities of development are awaiting the remnant of the human race that will stagger, dazed and deafened, into the light of a new day. "When a Canadian forest is destroyed by fire, the growth next spring is of a totally new kind, and no one has yet told whence came the seed of this new, different growth. After a prairie fire, similarly, new flowers spring up that were not there before. The subsoil possibly has concealed them; they are discovered by the fiery heat." In the same way many of our old customs and creeds, our vulgarities, stupidities, ignorance and pride, we may hope, are being burnt out of the race, and in the time to come we shall "build lighter...live more carelessly, and nearer to the stars." It is a gracious and consoling gospel, and one by no means new, after all, though each generation puts it in a fresh form. We seem to hear in every word the old call to the free and adventurous life of the spirit, to the great experiments of faith, to the joyous existence born of complete trust in God; and a voice within us whispers, as if re-echoing the music of a happier world than ours, "consider the lilies," "take no thought for the morrow," "lay not up treasures on earth," "not a sparrow falls to the ground," "have faith as a grain of mustard seed," "seek ye first the kingdom of God."

BOOKS AND REVIEWS.

NONCONFORMIST ADVICES.*

NONCONFORMITY might have given us a stronger book than this to meet the needs arising out of the war for restatements and new orientations of all kinds. There are twenty writers, with such subjects as 'The Church of the Future,' 'The Gospel of the Future,' 'The Present and the Future,' 'The Tasks that follow Triumph,' 'Great Britain's Greater Needs,' and the editor is announced as already having written 'Practical Points in Popular Proverbs,' and 'On Peak, Pyramid, and Prairie.' Aiming at popular address, the essays and lectures display much earnestness in insisting on the nation's need of moral idealism. Like all such efforts these appeals will be satisfactory to those who are already convinced. It is difficult to find in them, for the most part, any suggestive viewpoint from which the newer problems of the time might be helpfully examined. There are many strong words on the need of "reality" in religion for the armies that will return to us, but there is no word about lightening the load of impossible doctrines which still make the gospel unreal. Some shibboleths live long. One writer says: "The priest idea has eaten the heart out of every religion into which it has entered," and his subject is 'Christian Unity'! Nonconformists must learn not to talk "through their hats" in this way. "Priest" is one of the beloved words of the New Testament, as it is of poetry (see Wordsworth and Keats), and of all religions but the exceptional varieties that prove the rule. This writer does well to assert the necessity of the Evangelical note, which is still the glory of the Free Churches, but he must try to gain a wider outlook. Dr. Orchard, who writes one of the outstanding papers in the book ('The New Catholicism'), supplies the needful corrective in this matter. "We want to conserve all that variety of experience and the freedom for cultivating it which has caused all our denominational splits. I have great sympathy with the Baptists in desiring to make baptism a more meaningful ordinance. I want to retain forever the fire and holiness of Methodism. There is no reason why the Quakers should go out of the Church to get either silence or spontaneity. But it is only as you have these things within the same body that they are corrected from extravagance. Especially do we stand for the faith that this new Catholicism can only come by the baptism of the Holy Ghost and definite human response. Of themselves, machinery and proposals for union cannot accomplish anything more than multiply size and bind together things perhaps already dead. But when that baptism does come, it will provide only the fire and the force, not the channel and the form. No one denies that the whole Church is a priestly body, so I do not see how you can deny the name to those whom the Church sets apart for the supreme office of leading its sacrificial worship. Wherever a congregation selects one of its number for that purpose you have a valid priesthood because it is representative." This essay is so pregnant with good things that one would like to quote much more. There are two finely reasoned papers by Dr. Hodgkin and Prof. H. G. Wood on 'Christian Internationalism,' and the latter supports Archbishop Söderblom's (Swedish) proposal for an International Christian Conference. The inclusion of a paper by Dr. Saleeby on 'The Gospel of Health' is a good sign. He says some vigorous words on our stupid hospital method of "mopping up the mess" caused by alcoholism, syphilis, and tuberculosis, instead of preventing these scourges. Nine-tenths of all disease can be prevented!

CRIME AND PUNISHMENT.

IN the course of an address on 'Crime and Punishment' recently delivered at the annual meeting of the Humanitarian League, Mr. Laurence Housman pointed out that if we humanise the prison system before we humanise the slums, we may run the danger of making prisons so attractive that slum dwellers will commit crimes in order to get arrested! This, of course, led to an indictment of society for allowing the slums to exist, and for denying the gospel of human brotherhood, which, if it were universally applied, would abolish poverty and, with it, a vast amount of crime that is directly or indirectly attributable to the sordid conditions in which millions of our fellow-creatures are living. The members of the Penal Reform League, whose Quarterly Record has now made a welcome appearance after an interval of about three and a half years, would certainly endorse Mr. Housman's remarks, for their activities are based on the belief that wrong-doing is due, to a very large extent, to unfavourable environment and abnormal conditions, resulting in a dangerous suppression of personality and the encouragement of all those debasing tendencies which are the product of badly-nurtured bodies and stunted and enfeebled minds. The League has done a great deal to enlighten the public on matters relating to the inhabitants of our prisons, and in view of the grave problems which war-conditions have intensified—especially juvenile delinquency, and the relaxation of habits of self-control on the part of numbers of young people for whom the excitements of a time like the present constitute a serious moral danger—we cannot be too grateful for the persevering way in which it carries on its work. Those who are interested in the subject of Penal Reform, which is not a merely ameliorative process of making things more comfortable but involves psychological, educational, economic and religious considerations of the utmost importance, would do well to procure this enlarged number of The Record. It can be obtained from the office, 68A Park Hill Road, London, N.W.3, price 1s. The reports of the Annual Meeting, at which Miss Damer Dawson, Commandant of the Women Police Service, gave an interesting address on the work of the women police, and the Conferences on 'Juvenile Delinquency' and 'The Law and Solicitation' respectively, presided over by Lord Henry Bentinck, contain much valuable information, and space is given to a number of reviews of books dealing with prison life, the training of children, the continuation school, adolescence, education and social progress which offer useful guidance and innumerable suggestions to students of these subjects.

M. CLAPARÈDE, who has published a pamphlet at Lausanne entitled 'L'Europe et les Races dite Inférieures,' expresses the hope that Switzerland, which was the birthplace of the Red Cross work, may also see the foundation of a Black Cross or a Golden Cross league in the interests of these "so-called inferior races." In regard to our own attitude towards native races we are glad to see that M. Claparède regards it as an undeniable fact that "in spite of a thousand blunders, a thousand hindrances to the fulfilment of its proper ideal, the guiding thought of England at its best has been to colonise the world with a new spirit."

MEMORIAL NOTICES.

THE LATE REV. H. C. HORSLEY.

THE funeral of the late Rev. H. C. Horsley, M.A., whose early death we reported last week, took place at the Manchester Crematorium on July 18, the Rev. J. McDowell officiating. Last Sunday the Rev. R. Philipson, one of his college friends, paid a high tribute to his character at the memorial service held at Moss Side Church. He was imbued, said the preacher, by a true Christian ideal, and his example would be an inspiration to the congregation to cherish and to imitate in the trying times which have so sadly come upon them. In addition to the particulars of our brief memoir we should record that our late comrade had already made a mark in the six months of his ministry at Moss Side; he personally conducted a visiting campaign, introduced innovations to promote the social welfare of the members, and was an immense favourite with the boys. His interest in athletics was shown in the college boat of Lincoln where he won his oar in 1911.

LIEUTENANT NOEL F. PERRIS.

WE regret to record the death, on Saturday, July 20th, of Lieutenant Noel F. Perris, R.A.F., which was caused by a collision in the air between two aeroplanes as they were mounting in response to an alarm of an air-raid. Noel Perris was the only son of Mr. and Mrs. George Herbert Perris, and only surviving grandson of the Rev. Henry Woods Perris—his cousin, Second Lieutenant Eric Perris, having been killed on the Somme two years ago. He was born on Christmas Day, 1893, and was therefore in his 25th year. Shortly after the commencement of the war he volunteered as a private, rose through the various grades to be an officer, and served for three years in the Infantry, in Malta, Egypt, Gallipoli, and France. Wounded on the Somme, he was invalided home, and after recovery joined the Royal Flying Corps (now the R.A.F.).

Of a gentle and loving nature, Lieut. Perris was animated by a strong sense of duty, and his superior officers speak of him warmly as a good and conscientious soldier. He hated war, but he hated the tyranny of militarism more, and is one of many bright lads who have given their lives, in the true crusading spirit, for a cause which they thought sacred. For the older generation they are the vicarious sacrifice upon which, we pray, a better future will be built. His father recently received the Legion of Honour from the French Government for his services as Special Correspondent throughout the war. For both parents, and two surviving sisters, deep sympathy will be felt.

The funeral took place at Detling Church, near Maidstone, on Thursday, July 25th, and was conducted by the Rev. Canon Horsley.

CORRESPONDENCE.

SOLDIERS AND PADRES.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—Perhaps a few musings on the religious side of my experiences in France would not be uninteresting to some of your readers. Some little time ago, when I read my brother Dr. Harman Taylor's letter to you, written from Egypt, I had intended writing to you, endorsing all his views; however, the exigencies of military service owing to the Hun offensive on our front prevented me from doing so.

In the first place, probably few Unitarians have worshipped God in as many varied places as myself. From a Buddhist temple in far-off Malaya to a small knoll in Picardy, not as many miles away from the Boche lines as there are fingers on one hand, covers a wide field, and if perchance my criticism of Unitarians at home should hurt the feelings of some people, it will not be difficult for your readers to appreciate the reasons.

In a copy of THE INQUIRER just to hand, I read of more of the ministers applying for leave from their congregations so that they might be able to do a few months in France with the Y.M.C.A., and I feel convinced permission will have been willingly granted. It is perhaps a little late in the day for some of the younger men to come forward—men whom I knew as students at Summer-ville College, Manchester, some of them younger than myself—but, then, each man has his own conscience, and must decide for himself what is his duty to his country and his fellow men. Suffice it to say I am one of four sons, all of us soldiers in the army, and two of us came home nearly ten thousand miles each to fight for Britain.

During our spell in the trenches in France—for the "Guards" do go into the trenches, besides fighting battles, although many people appear to think otherwise—I came into close touch with my men, and asked them their opinions on various matters. One man in my company was a padre, a curate in Brixton and a graduate of Oxford before he joined up in the army, and on questioning him why he joined the ranks and not as a chaplain, his reply was (I shall always remember it): "I thought I had better go through it like the rest of the boys, sir, for later on, when I go back to my work after the war is over, I can get them into my confidence if they know I was in it like themselves." He is now a corporal, known as Mr. — to his fellow soldiers, and I feel confident, if he lives through the war, his church will not have row after row of empty pews whilst the streets outside are thronged with people.

I have also asked the men what they thought of their various padres—quite against all military etiquette, for both the padres and the medicos are one's brother officers; but then I come from Lancashire, and the majority of our N.C.O.s and men hail from the Black Country, Lancashire, and Yorkshire, and so I knew them. "We do not think much of Mr. —," and although I tried to find out why, the men would never tell, till I found out the reason a few days afterwards. Two of our men were killed by a shell, and, as usual, notice was sent to the padre where the burial would take place. It may have been a coincidence, I cannot tell, but just about the time arranged for their burial the Boches started shelling very badly, and the padre failed to turn up. I do not anticipate he will ever have a full church. "Our last padre was a real good one, sir, and we were all sorry to lose him." I never knew my brother officer in question, for he was wounded at the Cambrai battle. He went into battle with the men, right at the beginning, and preparatory to becoming a casualty was seen handing hard boiled eggs and offering his flask to the wounded. He was a true follower of the Master, and his church will not be empty after the war.

What a contrast between the last two men, both of them learned clerics of the Church of England.

In conclusion, perhaps a little personal incident would not be out of place. My youngest brother, joining up ere he was 18, proceeded south to a camp near Richmond, a stranger in a strange country. Unfortunately I was still in the Orient at the time, but he told me afterwards he felt rather lonely, and his chums, who were Congregationalists, invited him to their homes near at hand. There is a Unitarian Church at Richmond, and I feel sure the members of its congregation would have welcomed a brother worshipper of the Lord who at the same time was training to fight for his country. The brother in question came to France, went through some of the hardest fighting in the Hun offensive of March 29, won a decoration for bravery on the field, and will ere long be a "Guards" officer as well. I wonder if he will have pleasant recollections of what Unitarians did for him in the "Great War." Some one was to blame in this case, which, I am afraid, is by no means an isolated one.

Therefore, if Unitarianism is to be, as I feel sure it will be, a live religion, and the true religion of the future, then let its members gird up their loins and prepare for the day; for, after all, the Man of the World, Jesus Christ, based his teachings on everyday experiences. Would it not be better for those who are anxious to preach his mission to others to imitate his example, and live the life out here, even for a short while? I wonder whose text would draw the thronging crowds outside a country church on a beautiful summer afternoon, that on 'Plato's Doctrine of the Soul,' or 'Through Hell with the Men in France?' I leave your readers to judge for themselves.—Yours, &c.,

MONTHLY NOTES.

* THE response to my appeal for help for the tuberculous Belgian soldiers at Chambéry has been very kind, and I have every confidence that the full amount required to meet the cost of laying on water to the hospital will be forthcoming. Since I wrote last, the hospital is to be increased to double the size, and there will be nearly 400 people in the building and annexe. It makes the work we propose to do of double value.

The Hut at Calais has been very busy lately in spite of enemy action. The very fine Belgian orchestra which the Queen of the Belgians sent to England to give the concert at the Albert Hall stopped at our Hut for dinner, bed and breakfast, both on its way over and on its return. There were 130 performers, all picked artists, and they gave a concert at the Hut before leaving to return to the Front. Belgium's Day, July 21, was celebrated with an entertainment for the men, and a dinner for the officers, and all went off very well. The Maternity Home is now settled in its new quarters in the country. Our clientèle comes not only from Calais but from all the surrounding villages. It was most undesirable that they should come into the town under present conditions, and very many women who lived in Calais have now been sent away to safer quarters. Mme. Lageot, the directrice, has secured a place some miles outside the town, and has now opened the maternity home there. It is a very pleasant quiet spot, there is a good garden, and the mothers move out into the open air as soon as they are able. It is a pretty sight to see them lying out in long chairs under the trees with the little white cradles beside them. There is no doubt the conditions now are very much better than before, and we are not too far from the town to have the services of the military doctors, as we have a car for the use of the home. Several regular subscribers to this branch of our work have recently dropped off, and I should be very glad to see their places taken by others. There is no way we can help Belgium better than by looking after these babies, who will be her future citizens.

NOTES ON SOME RECENT BOOKS.

[A short Notice in this column does not preclude a review in a later issue.]

Bennett (T.), LL.D., B.A.(Lond.). FREE CHURCHES AND THE STATE. London, Stevens & Sons. 32 pp., 4s. n.

The purpose of this treatise is "to give a general exposition of the legal principles which govern the position of the Free Churches within the State." Free Churches belong to the class of societies known in law as voluntary associations, carrying on their existence on the basis of mutual agreement among members, and the subject of their legal status is considered under the heads of Contract; Property and Trusts; Acts of Parliament applying to Free Churches generally; and State Law Courts.

Cohu (Rev. J. R.), M.A. THE EVOLUTION OF THE CHRISTIAN MINISTRY (Modern Churchman's Library, II.). Murray, 1918. 128 pp. index, 3s. 6d. n.

Basing his argument on Lightfoot, Gwatkin, Hort, and other standard historians, the author shows that the episcopal system—which he supports—cannot claim final authority as an establishment set up by Christ; that its development, though including mixed elements, was under divine guidance; and that further self-organisation is possible and desirable in the new social and intellectual conditions of to-day.

Desmond (Shaw). THE SOUL OF DENMARK. London, T. Fisher Unwin. 277 pp., 10s. 6d. n.

A brightly written book, full of human touches, in which a description is given of Danish life from the point of view of one who has lived some years in Denmark and is much attracted by her people.

Dubash (P. S. G.), D.Sc. COLOUR AND THE CHILD. The International College of Chromatics. 40 pp., 2s.

Dr. Dubash is the Vice-President of the International College of Chromatics, and this little treatise on colour-training for the child is not lacking in suggestion and interest. More might have been said on the subject from the psychological point of view, which has such an important bearing on education (and, as we are constantly hearing, therapeutics), but it was evidently Dr. Dubash's intention merely to give some useful and practical hints which intelligent parents and enthusiastic teachers may amplify indefinitely.

Fox (Rev. A.), M.A. THE ETHICS AND THEOLOGY OF THE OLD TESTAMENT (Modern Handbooks of Religion). Lindsey Press, 1918. 296 pp. index, 3s. 6d. n.

Mr. Fox's high reputation as a popular expounder of scripture gives assurance of careful and sympathetic work; at once scholarly and simple in style his new book is sure to help towards a better understanding of Bible men and their thoughts. A useful list of works on the different sections is given.

Loseby (Arthur J.). THE GREAT HEREAFTER AND THE ROAD TO PERFECTION. London, Arthur H. Stockwell. 77 pp., 1s. n.

The writer of this little book has chosen a great theme which only the genius of a Milton could triumphantly grapple with, and it is not a matter of surprise that it has proved too severe a test for his powers. It is the result of over fifty years' thought and study, and the glowing faith which inspired it was largely reinforced by the teaching of the late Archdeacon of Westminster, which was the means of dispelling many of the author's doubts.

Phillipson (Coleman), M.A., LL.D., Litt.D. ALSACE-LORRAINE, PAST, PRESENT, AND FUTURE; with four maps. London, T. Fisher Unwin. 327 pp., 25s. n.

This is essentially a book to be read in the impartial spirit which characterises the author. The perplexing problems confronting us as soon as we begin to talk seriously about the future of Alsace-Lorraine need to be studied with care, and it is well that we should be reminded that "Alsace-Lorraine has all along been most anxious that the question should be settled by pacific means, and that war on its account should be avoided." "War is the worst possible solution of our problems because war is no solution"—that was the view of leading Alsations and the attitude of the majority of the population in 1913, when Mr. Jordan conducted a personal inquiry on the spot.

Quiller-Couch (Sir A.), M.A. STUDIES IN LITERATURE. Cambridge University Press, 1918. 326 pp. index, 10s. 6d. n.

An attractive book, varied in subject, vivacious, now and again original, always sensible. Two-thirds of it is occupied with distinguished writers—some seventeenth-century poets and some of the nineteenth. The rest is miscellaneous. Many of the chapters were delivered as lectures and are correspondingly lighter reading.

Rickard (Mrs. Victor). THE STORY OF THE MUNSTERS AT ETREUX, FESTUBERT, RUE DU BLOIS, AND HULLOCH. Hodder & Stoughton. 116 pp., 2s. 6d. n.

Mrs. Rickard's vivid narrative is a tribute to the men of the Royal Munster Fusiliers, whose cap-badge bears the distinctively Irish emblem of the shamrock. Several portraits are included in the volume, to which Lord Dunraven contributes an historical introduction.

Rowntree (B. Seebohm). THE HUMAN NEEDS OF LABOUR. London, Nelson & Sons. 166 pp., 3s. 6d.

Assuming, as we must, that labour will never be content to go back after the war to the poverty-stricken conditions which obtained up to 1914, and that industry which cannot afford to pay a reasonable wage is in an unhealthy state, Mr. Rowntree tries to show what is the lowest minimum upon which a man or woman can subsist and maintain self-respect. Readers of his earlier books will not need to be told that he has made his investigations in a thorough and sympathetic manner.

Royden (A. Maude). THE HOUR AND THE CHURCH. London, G. Allen & Unwin. 95 pp., 2s. n.

The note of sincerity rings through every word that Miss Royden utters, and if she criticises the Church to which she belongs, and for which she entertains such high hopes, it is because she is passionately desirous that it should be really representative of the nation at its best. And, of course, it must seek the path of reunion with other Churches, sinking the fundamental differences that are the great obstacles to fellowship. "What differences can be fundamental between those who love and follow Christ?" she asks.

Service (Robert W.). SELECTED POEMS. London, T. Fisher Unwin. 32 pp., 8d. n.

The poems in this handy booklet are taken from 'Songs of a Sourdough,' 'Rhymes of a Red-Cross Man,' and other volumes of verse by the "Canadian Kipling," as he has been called. They are preceded by a short sketch of his adventurous and romantic life.

Stilwell (E. A.). THE GREAT PLAN. London, Hodder & Stoughton. 160 pp., 2s. 6d. n.

The author of this book postulates as the first step towards universal peace the addition of a Secretary of Peace to the Cabinet of each nation, and the calling of an International Congress by these secretaries to work out his plan "for 100 years' peace, and for a world issue of bonds to purchase the same." As each nation must also agree to a progressive system of disarmament, and the question of disarmament is one which no country is likely to take up while the issue of the present war hangs in the balance, the scheme cannot be considered one of immediate practical utility.

Thompson (Theodora). THE COMING DAWN. London, John Lane. 285 pp., 5s. n.

This War Anthology, which is dedicated to President Wilson and has a preface by Sir Oliver Lodge, has been compiled by Miss Theodora Thompson, whose 'Underneath the Bough,' a collection of passages from the best ancient and modern literature, proved that she was widely read and that she possessed excellent judgment in selecting good things from books. Amongst the writers quoted in this volume are many whose names are familiar to readers of THE INQUIRER as exponents of Liberal Christianity.

Yates (L. K.). THE WOMAN'S PART. London, Hodder & Stoughton. 84 pp., 1s. 3d. n.

A record of munitions work with 24 full-page illustrations. The 'Welfare' and 'Housing' sections are particularly interesting, and are written with sympathy and insight.

Zimmern (Alfred E.). NATIONALITY AND GOVERNMENT. London, Chatto & Windus. 386 pp., 10s. 6d. n.

The author of 'The Greek Commonwealth' has given us, in this volume, a fascinating study of the conditions which are shaping a greater Commonwealth still. The ideals of Prussianism, and of what is now known as "Bolshevism," are in conflict with a third principle which men from five continents have come thousands of miles to vindicate, and that principle will be the unifying and reconstructive element in the new era that is dawning for a troubled world.

PAMPHLETS.

German Intrigues in Persia. London, Hodder & Stoughton. 40 pp., 3d. n.

The diary of a German agent who was a member of the Niedermayer expedition through Persia to Afghanistan and India. The object of this expedition was apparently to create a "belligerent Persia," to flood her with "German instructors," and to use her to serve Germany's ambitions with complete disregard of her own interests.

Pollock (Sir Frederick). THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS AND THE COMING RULE OF LAW. Oxford University Press. 15 pp., 3d. n.

Sir Frederick Pollock's treatment of this subject is marked by moderation and caution, which do not lessen the conviction that he has the subject very much at heart. The League of Nations must obviously be organised, he says, "by solemn express convention," and its binding force must depend on the renouncement of independent sovereign power, "and the right to be judge in one's own case" by every party to it.

The Re-education of the Adult: 1. THE NEURASTHENIC IN WAR AND PEACE (Arthur J. Brock, M.D., Edin., Temp. Capt. R.A.M.C.); 2. THE CONVALESCENT AS ARTIST-CRAFTSMAN (Henry Wilson). London, Headley Bros. 19 pp., 6d.

Two very suggestive papers in the series which is being issued for the Cities Committee of the Sociological Society. Dr. Brock emphasises the principle that the deepest lessons about the normal may be learned from the abnormal, and shows that "war-psychology is but an 'acute' exacerbation of a more or less chronic or 'sub-acute' condition, from which our society had been suffering long before the flare-up of the present war." Mr. Wilson deals with the misuse of machines and machine industry which has suppressed the artist in man, and suggests ways in which we might utilise the wealth of creative enterprise possessed by our wounded and disabled soldiers.

Sadler (Gilbert T.), M.A., LL.B. THE WORLD-RELIGION. London, Cassell & Co. 7 pp.

"The souls that are redeemed by redeeming others will lead the way into a World-Republic of free peoples," and the heart of the world-religion "is the Life lost and found, lost on a lower level, found unsought on a higher level." That is Mr. Sadler's message, stated in his characteristic way with very little elaboration, but sounding always the note of love and joy in the service of our fellow-men.

The War and the Approach to Peace: the policy of Lord Lansdowne. 'Common Sense' Office. 34 pp., 6d.

'Common Sense' has done the public a service in collecting Lord Lansdowne's recent letters and speeches on the possibilities of peace and re-issuing them in handy pamphlet form. It is an advantage to have them available for reference, quite apart from the various opinions which are entertained about Lord Lansdowne's views.

The Worship of the Church: being the Report of the Archbishop's Second Committee of Inquiry. London, S.P.C.K. 43 pp.

Long months have been given to the preparation of the five Reports which are the outcome of the National Mission in 1916, and this one will repay careful study on the part of those who are interested in the views of Anglicans on the decline of public worship.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Belfast.—The Non-Subscribing Presbyterian makes appreciative reference to Dr. Carpenter's recent visit to Irish churches, which has done so much to stimulate their faith and rouse them to fresh activity. Reference is also made to the death of Dr. Drummond, which has awakened "the deepest sympathy in many Irish hearts and homes," and of Dr. Hragrove, whose visit to the North of Ireland a few years ago is well remembered. Cairncastle.—Miss Ellen Hunter, the last member of a large family of faithful attendants at the Old Meeting House, passed away a few weeks ago. She was in her 89th year, and had been failing for some time. She will be long remembered for her generosity and hospitality. Ballycarry.—Mrs. James Campbell, one of the oldest members of the church, whose death at the age of 79 has recently occurred, was widely known and esteemed for her kindness of heart and practical sympathy even for persons unknown to her who called at her house and asked for help. She had been blind for some years, and the end was not unexpected. Glenarm.—The death is recorded of Private Robert James Pullin, New Zealand Rifles, who met his death about May 3 in the present year. He was the youngest son of Mr. Wm. B. Pullin, Glenarm. Prior to his departure for New Zealand, about fourteen years ago, Mr. R. J. Pullin, like his father and the other members of the family, took a great interest in the affairs of the Glenarm congregation. He was a member of the choir, and also gave valuable assistance in getting up entertainments of various kinds. He was home on leave from France at the end of March on what proved to be his last visit. Private Thomas Finlay, Argyle and Sutherland Highlanders, son of Mr. Thomas Finlay, was killed early in the war, but his name has not, apparently, been previously recorded in The Non-Subscribing Presbyterian.

Bradford: Chapel Lane.—The Rev. A. Cobden Smith will commence his ministry at Chapel Lane Chapel on Sunday, July 28, and arrangements are being made for the Welcome Meeting on Saturday, August 10.—The Rev. T. Paxton was on Monday presented with a roll top desk and other gifts on his leaving Bradford for Scarborough.

Bristol.—Dr. Tudor Jones, minister of Lewin's Mead, recently concluded another series of lectures in the important munition centre of Barrow-in-Furness. These lectures have been delivered under the auspices of the Y.M.C.A. at the Triangle Club, and have been greatly appreciated by the large audiences which gathered in the spacious assembly hall to hear them. The earlier ones were on 'The Art of Reasoning' and 'The Growth of the Mind,' while other courses included such subjects as 'The Ascent of Man.' It has been arranged that Dr. Tudor Jones shall pay another visit to Barrow (his fourth) in the autumn. After his last lecture he was presented with a case of pipes, &c., also with an Art Volume on the Lake District, as a token of gratitude on behalf of the munition workers of Barrow.

Coseley.—The 119th Sunday School Anniversary Services were held in the Old Meeting House on July 7, the preachers morning and evening being Mrs. E. W. Martin and the Rev. John Ewart. In the afternoon the choir rendered a sacred cantata. The concluding service on the evening of July 21 was conducted by the minister, the Rev. W. G. Topping. The children, who had been trained by Mr. E. Green, sang special hymns at all the services.

Dublin: Stephen's Grove.—A Sale of Work in aid of the Singleton School, Dublin (an institution for teaching, educating, and training girls who are in necessitous circumstances for domestic service) was held in June, and the sum of £79 net was realised.—The congregation is keeping together well, despite the troubles of war conditions, and the fact that some thirty-two members and attenders are away on military duties of one sort or another. Twenty-one new members joined the church last year, and the congregation has now quite recovered from the disastrous fire of 1916 which affected the attendance for some little time. The last part of the restoration took place on Sunday, June 23, when the new stained glass window was dedicated, a large congregation being present. The window is erected in place of the former Wilson Memorial window which was burnt out. The design has been altered, and the window, which is very rich in colour, is the work of Mr. A. E. Child, at Miss Purser's Studio in Dublin. The Rev. E. Savell Hicks's address on this occasion has been published in pamphlet form, with illustrations showing portions of the window, by the Irish Unitarian Society.

Hull.—The following extract from a letter written by a member of the R.A.M.C. in Salonica is taken from the current number of Home Fires: "I was never closely attached to Park Street, but on the few occasions I visited your church I felt that it was a church of which its members may be justly proud. Among my soldier friends there are two very differing opinions as to the future of the churches. Some think that when the war is over the churches will increase extensively both in numbers and in strength. They claim that through the war men of all classes have been so near to suffering and to death that their minds will naturally turn towards religion, and that they will seek the help and the solace which only religion can give. But there are others who claim that the churches have failed to make good use of the glorious opportunity which this terrible conflict gave them. And because they (the churches) have so failed they must go out of existence. For my own part, I am convinced that the day of ordinary conventional orthodoxy is over, and if the churches are going to stand the test of time they will have to be churches such as Park Street is."

Leicester.—It is announced in the Great Meeting Calendar that Miss Margaret Gimson has been awarded the Order of the British Empire for her public services, especially in connection with her work for discharged soldiers. This is a public recognition of Miss Gimson's services, which are widely and highly appreciated, not only in connection with the war, but as having been given so fully, before the war as well, for others.

Liverpool: Ancient Chapel.—The Rev. J. C. Odgers, preaching at the Ancient Chapel last Sunday week, gave a timely and encouraging description of some new ideas and ideals born out of the travail of the war. He showed how these new ideas had mysteriously but certainly gained ground, so that already the world is a different world in its acknowledgment of new unities, fellowships, and values. To certain animosities and divisions it can never whole-heartedly go back. The men in the trenches, with their strong sense of what is real, have killed them, putting new contentions in their places, which have spread from the trenches to the national thought and life. The reflection that we are being saved by quite ordinary men, who have been caught up by an idea big enough to die for—saved not only from the menace of Prussianism, but from strongly-rooted evil at home—was fruitfully elaborated by Mr. Odgers.

Liverpool: Mill Street Domestic Mission.—On Tuesday evening, July 9, a meeting of the workers of the Mission was held to welcome the Rev. J. C. Ballantyne and Mrs. Ballantyne. Mrs. T. Lloyd Jones presided over a large gathering. Short addresses were given by the Rev. J. Anderton and C. P. Scott, the Misses Howe, A. Jones, and Spence, Messrs. Baron, Norman Hall, F. Robinson, and H. Wardle. Mr. Ballantyne responded, expressing his deep appreciation of the warmth of the welcome given to him, and referred in sympathetic terms to the labours of his immediate predecessors at the Mission. He placed before his hearers some of the hopes and purposes which animated him at the beginning of his work amongst them, and invited their hearty co-operation.

London: Islington.—On Sunday evening next, July 28, the Rev. J. Vint Laughland will preach his farewell sermon at Unity Church, having been obliged to resign his ministry at Islington through ill-health. The preacher for the morning will be Mr. J. Harvey Lewis.

London: Theistic Church.—At a Social Meeting recently held at Hurlingham Club to welcome the Rev. J. Tyssul Davis and Mrs. Davis, the chairman, Mr. Sanderson, expressed the thanks of the congregation to the Unitarian ministers (some of whom were present) who had kindly assisted in the services before Mr. Davis's settlement with them; and especially to the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie for his help in the arrangements. Mr. Bowie, in response, said there was need of all possible workers in the cause of progressive religion in the metropolis, and he hoped that the congregation would prosper under their new minister.

Manchester: Blackley.—On Sunday, July 7, Sunday School Anniversary Services were held at the Unitarian Chapel, when the Rev. G. Randall Jones of Pendleton preached. In the afternoon the children gave a service of song.

Mottram.—On Sunday, July 14, the scholars of the Unitarian Church had their annual "Walking Day" and prize distribution, going in procession to the Market Place, where hymns were sung, and the minister, the Rev. H. Bodell Smith, delivered an address. There were large congregations morning and evening, and eleven more prizes than last year were distributed.

Newcastle-on-Tyne.—The Rev. Alfred Hall concluded his ministry of ten and a half years at Newcastle last Sunday, July 21. A gathering of the congregation was held to bid him and Mrs. Hall farewell on Tuesday, July 16, when, despite very inclement weather, the schoolroom was crowded. Letters regretting inability to attend and appreciative of Mr. Hall's services were read by the Secretary, Mr. Pescod, from Mrs. Tweedy, Sir J. Baxter Ellis, and Prof. Bedson. The chair was taken by Mr. James Thomson, M.A., the nephew of the late Lord Kelvin, who said that highly as he valued Mr. Hall's preaching, he valued his friendship no less. Mr. Otto Levin, J.P., on behalf of the congregation presented Mr. Hall with the Supplementary Volume of Hastings' 'Dictionary of the Bible' and a cheque for £90, subscribed by one hundred friends. Mr. Levin reviewed the past ten years, and spoke of the earnestness with which Mr. Hall had worked and especially the manner in which he had been near to them in times of sorrow and trouble. Mrs. Manning, in a moving speech, at the close of which she presented Mrs. Hall with a handbag and bouquet, expressed the deep regret of the ladies that they were going to lose her. In spite of many domestic duties, she had thrown herself heart and soul into the work of the church, and won the affection of them all. Mr. T. R. Short, the President of the Northumberland and Durham Unitarian Association, speaking with great appreciation of all that Mr. Hall had done for the Association which he had served as President, Secretary, and Vice-President, presented an oil painting, a suit-case, and a pocket case containing Treasury Notes. Mr. Hall in reply said that this departure involved a painful uprooting, but he could never be entirely freed from them, and he had no desire to be. Mrs. Hall also responded.

Portsmouth.—Appeal is made by the Rev. G. W. Thompson and officers of the High Street congregation for help toward urgently needed repairs to the ancient chapel, the bicentenary of which is to be celebrated in October, Dr. Carpenter taking the services. They remind us of the bitter persecution suffered by the heroic founders of the congregation; the first minister, the Rev. John Hicks, virtually died in the cause of freedom. Thanks to the brave pioneers a flourishing church gathered in many leading families of the town, and a long list of mayors and other municipal officials are on its roll. "John Pounds, of sacred memory," received here the religious impetus which he in turn diffused so widely in the Ragged School movement. Changed conditions have led to the dwindling of the congregation, one cause being the "dilapidated and depressing" state of the building. The British and Foreign Unitarian Association Executive cordially approve the scheme for repairs, and promise a grant in aid if the amount raised by the congregation and friends warrants the carrying out of the plan. The minister has this summer addressed meetings on the Common numbering from 300 to 1,000, so that, given a fair chance, there should be a revival of attendance at the chapel. All who are interested in the stirring history of our religious predecessors, and who wish to maintain these ancient meeting houses, not only as historical monuments but as centres of spiritual life for the present and future generations, are earnestly asked to assist the few who are now faithfully trying to bear the burden, and to send contributions. The amount required is at least £200; the Treasurer's address is Mr. A. Williams, 63 Fawcett Road, Southsea.

Scottish Churches.—Glasgow.—Ross Street Church has been placed in the care of the Rev. L. Jenkins Jones, minister of St. Vincent Street Church, in view of the difficulty owing to war conditions of procuring a successor to the late minister. Kirkcaldy.—The Sunday school is prospering, and so much earnestness has been shown by the children in trying to fulfil Dr. Wood's injunction, given on a recent visit, to double their numbers that this has already been done, and there is a prospect of others joining.—The death is announced of Mr. Soutar, for many years an active and much esteemed member of the congregation.

An Appeal to the Conscience of the Nation.From the Yearly Meeting of the Society of Friends.

For more than 250 years the Religious Society of Friends has endeavoured first to learn and then to obey the will of God with regard to the part to be taken by the Society as a whole or by its members individually in public affairs. In the past this attitude has often involved opposition to the views which prevailed at the time, and on rarer occasions has brought the Society into temporary conflict with the authority of the State. With regard to Public Worship, Marriage, and Oaths, the persistent stand taken by Friends has helped to secure religious freedom for all who desire to avail themselves of it.

To-day a similar stand is being made for freedom of conscience. Some 1,100 men are serving sentences with hard labour in prison because they are deemed to be soldiers, while their consciences absolutely forbid them so to regard themselves. Many of these men are serving their third or fourth sentence, nominally for disobedience to a military order, but actually because they have remained firm to those convictions which they have clearly stated to the Tribunals and Courts Martial before which they have been brought. A further 3,000 men have been transferred from prison to Home Office camps and settlements, where, though they have had some relief from the worst features of prison treatment, they are by no means free from penal conditions.

Our appeal to the conscience of the Nation is primarily concerned with the 1,100 men still in prison. Does imprisonment solve the problem set by these men, who owe allegiance to a law higher than that of the State? Can their treatment be regarded with equanimity by any believer in religious freedom? A number of these prisoners have already served sentences totalling two years' hard labour, and are still being sent back to prison, with only a brief change to the barrack's guard room between the completion of one sentence and the beginning of the next.

On account of the severity of the conditions, two years' hard labour is the maximum sentence of the kind permissible for aggravated crime. It is not the "hard labour" alone which constitutes the severity, but the accompanying conditions of solitary confinement, enforced silence, denial of any but the most limited communication with friends and relatives, together with meagre diet and insufficient air and exercise. The recent concessions afford only slight alleviation in cases where they apply.

These men have always expressed themselves as fully prepared to face the consequences of their action, and we believe that it is the power of God which has enabled them to endure all they have endured. Yet the stain on the conscience of the nation grows deeper the longer it acquiesces in such persecution. Week by week men are being released because of physical or mental collapse. Some have died, and others are suffering from serious mental derangement.

Can God-fearing men and women stand aside and allow this unnecessary suffering to continue? It is indeed only a drop in the great ocean of suffering caused by the war. But at this dark hour of its history the nation can ill afford to condone injustice or to lower its standard of moral right.

Signed in and on behalf of London Yearly Meeting,

JOHN H. BARLOW, Clerk.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

All letters and manuscripts for the Editor should be sent to 13 Bream's Buildings, Fetter Lane, London, E.C.4. They must reach the Editor not later than Wednesday morning for publication the same week.

As with bowed head we all once more, King and people, go to our prayers, the words of those who shared the burden and woe with us but are now beyond these shadows come to mind with peculiar force. Such are the words of Pastor Charles Wagner which shortly before his death he wrote, in lieu of speaking, to American audiences. He sets out in them "the religious and moral reasons which compel us not only to fight, but to go on in this war with unshakable determination until liberty and right are victorious." Declaring that "Bondage is the supreme shame and the supreme misery for a man conscious of his nobility and divine origin," he points to the manifest efforts of our foes to "achieve a world-wide domination," their cruel spoliations and hideous crimes, and to the robbers' "peace" which they proffer at the point of the sword.

"ALL religious and moral motives," said our beloved friend, "unite to make us the defenders of the right. There is neither excuse nor escape; the man of violence must be overthrown if we would again lead a quiet and free life." The nations "all understand that the world would be ruled by men without conscience, if conscientious men are not ready to support the right by armed force. . . . Let this hour find us ready and strong, determined to follow the Chief who is marching ahead, and who did not die on Calvary to doom his disciples to bondage, but to bring them forth to liberty."

THE Duke of Connaught, as Grand Prior of the Order of St. John of Jerusalem in England, and the Marquis of Lansdowne, as Chairman of the Council of the British Red Cross Society, have issued an appeal to the clergy and ministers of all denominations on behalf of "Prisoners and Captives." "There has never been a moment" they say, "when the number of prisoners was greater, or when the need for supplying them with food parcels was more urgent."

It is suggested that collections in aid might be appropriately made on Sunday, August 4th (to-morrow); the amounts raised may be sent either to a Regimental or Local Care Committee, or to the Earl of Sandwich, Chairman of the Central Prisoners of War Committee, 4, Thurlow Place, S.W.7. May we suggest that where, for any reason, a special offertory is not possible, private donations might be collected and forwarded. Who would not wish to share, however humbly, in such a work?

* * *

LORD LANSDOWNE, we cannot but think, was happier in collaborating with Prince Arthur in drafting the above appeal than in discharging the task which fell to him on Monday in the House of Lords. As he explained, a large number of valuable pearls have been given for the benefit of the Red Cross Society, and the opinion is held that a very much larger sum might be realised for them if put up in a lottery than is likely in a sale. But lotteries are illegal. His lordship therefore has brought in a Bill to legalise them—strictly for War Charities, and only during the war. We observe that the Archbishop of Canterbury spoke against the Bill, which nevertheless passed its second reading. Those who support the proposal appear to argue with Emilia—"It is a great price for a small vice," and they tell us that really the stream of "charity" shows signs of drying up—lotteries will set it going again. Will they? Or will they, by stimulating the gambling instinct, which always wants to get something without paying the price or doing the work, only muddy the stream at best? "Charity," or a big prize—which will be most thought of by the people who, apparently, cannot be persuaded to give for pity's sake? Does a racing bookman (who will presumably be liable to prosecution still) really care much for "improving the breed of horses"?

THE abominable behaviour of German troops, presumably under high command, has long outrun adequate terms of condemnation and disgust; but decent-minded people cannot help noting one of the latest outrages by these missionaries of high Kultur. At Château Thierry, prior to evacuating the town, they destroyed, or foully defaced, many hundreds of priceless manuscripts and illuminated books, no doubt with the reflection that if such things are needed for the intellectual and moral cultivation of Europe their able scholars and artificers can readily produce them, and in the very latest style. Those among us who may have been formerly inclined to allow something to the plea that the Louvain and other atrocities in the first months of the war were due to a soldiery that had gone temporarily mad must revise their judgment. There seems something inconceivably brutal, not to say bestial, in the make-up of the race.

THE incident gives point to a case recently tried at Geneva, as related by M. Louis Raemaekers to a representative of the Christian Commonwealth. A Swiss gentleman, we are told, made an exhibition of the Dutch artist's cartoons—that terrible Inferno in which these evil-doers are doomed to abide through all generations to come. At the instance of the German Consul-General the exhibitor was prosecuted by the Government for breach of neutrality, and, says Raemaekers, he "had to prove that my work was based upon fact. If he could show that my drawings were not stronger than the truth, then he was to be acquitted. He was allowed to give evidence, and did so to the effect that every one of my cartoons was founded on fact." The upshot was an acquittal, and the Swiss Government was condemned to pay costs. The Consul might have been wiser had he left the issue untried.

THE Judicial Committee of the Privy Council have reported this week on the ownership of the unalienated lands in Southern Rhodesia. Readers may remember a recent letter from Dr. Wickstead urging the claim of the Natives to sympathetic consideration. The findings of the Court are, we understand, as favourable to the case of the Natives as could be reasonably expected. Three other claims were put in, viz., on behalf of the Crown, the British South Africa Company, and the elected members of the Legislation Council of Southern Rhodesia respectively. Substantially the Crown wins its case, and is declared to hold dominion of all the lands. The Natives get security of their reserves, which were claimed by the Company as a commercial asset; there are, however, about 100,000 Natives on other parts of the territory the ownership of which appears to be undecided, and a question undecided is whether these people must go on paying rent, and to whom?

THE sub-title of a little book by Mr. R. R. Churchill, on 'Religion in the Navy,' to which the Warden of Keble gives a preface, is 'Facts and Visions.' A singular kind of vision is suggested in the following sentence from what is no doubt a well-meant book: "If every ship were the bearer of our Lord in the Reserved Sacrament, as every Communicant is the bearer of our Lord between one Communion and the next, by feeding on Him in real devoted energy, the kingdoms of the world would begin to tremble and the glorious armies of the Living God would advance towards their final and everlasting victory."

PROF. H. WILDER FOOTE of Harvard informs us that, on the invitation of President Lowell of Harvard University, a conference of representatives of over thirty of the leading Protestant theological schools in the United States will meet this month to discuss 'Problems of Theological Education arising out of the War.' It is expected that at least fifty official delegates will attend. The topics will include some of those which have recently engaged much attention among ourselves, e.g. 'Causes affecting the number and Quality of Students,' 'Measures to be taken to meet the Shortage of Ministers which will arise after the War,' 'The Indispensable Minimum and the Unattainable Ideal in Theological Education.' Adequate training for 'The Parish Minister,' for Religious Education in School and College, Church and Sunday School, and for Social Service will also come up for discussion. We hope that the wisdom elicited at the Conference will be duly reported for the benefit of outsiders and this-siders especially.

WITH this issue comes to an end the editorial tie between this journal and the Rev. W. H. Drummond, a severance regretted by him, as his letter this week shows, and certainly much regretted by the large circle of friends whom he has won through these pages. The Directors have warmly acknowledged the skill and high principle manifested in his conduct of THE INQUIRER, an acknowledgment which will be widely endorsed. Though his energies must now be given to another kind of service, patriotic as well as religious, we hope still to receive from time to time such contributions from his pen as his busy life in France may permit.

OLD readers will recall at this juncture the fact that Mr. Drummond's name is the fourth on the list of former editors still living, the doyen of the group being the Rev. T. L. Marshall, whose editorship began over sixty years ago, and whose great age—he is in his 94th year—goes far to juniorise men who think themselves veterans. His immediate successor, the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, with the welcome aid of his successor, the Rev. V. D. Davis and other experienced contributors—and, he trusts, with the generous goodwill of all, now more than ever needed—temporarily resumes charge. All communications should be sent to the office,

TO WHAT END ?

SINCE to-day, in the providence of God, we are brought once more directly face to face with that event which has no parallel in human history, let us try to look straight at it, and make up our minds as to its meaning, if not for the world, at least for us. The lapse of four years since the war began may too probably add to the difficulty of such an attempt, yet there should be also a chance of succeeding better than in the earlier days. The violence of emotion that swept over us then, though now and again renewed, has inevitably lessened. Alike on the good side and the bad, for there were both, men have somewhat parted from their selves of four years ago. Neither in their exaltation and fervour, as they voiced the nation's ideals, nor in their boastings and prophecies, as they anticipated victory, are our statesmen and public writers—in verse or prose—just where they were at the beginning. If this lessening of violence, whether of rapture or of rage, implies the ascendancy of manly resolution, and the reasoned policy now embodied in steady and habitual efforts to gain a noble and clearly discerned end, our lengthened experience has not been in vain.

But no thoughtful person can be unaware of some far other tendencies increasingly developing as the years go on. These habitual efforts, involved in our position as combatants or as a beleaguered population—have they not, necessary as they are in some degree, usurped an importance which by rights is not theirs? No doubt there are moments when, the vessel being in imminent peril, the business of simply keeping her afloat is paramount. At such a time he who pulls on a cable or stokes a fire must needs think and act as if his particular duty is the one thing that can save the ship. Let us gratefully rejoice that we have seen evidence of that useful conviction in many directions, if not in all. Men of all ranks and professions have flung themselves into the battle line, or poured out their utmost skill and strength in supporting the fighters; organisers of the national resources in men, munitions, commerce and food, have undeniably done splendid service. On such a reckoning day as this that man or woman must be indeed self-despised—if there be but a spark of honour left—who has not honestly, fully and zealously given of his or her energy and substance in this great cause.

We need say no more of mean self-seekers. May the searcher of all hearts stir them to a shame that shall result in nobler activity in the yet remaining months of war. All are needed, and never more needed than to-day. If nothing else can move the sluggish and cowardly to valiant self-surrender, before "the day goes by for ever," and they are damned to an infamy as sure as to-morrow's sun, surely the memory of our Dead, and the thought of the bitterly bereaved, whose hearts suffer, and yet are reverently glad in their immortal heroes, will quicken their better self. And shall it not quicken the better self of us all, including those who, in very fidelity to their detailed duty, are perhaps in some danger of mistaking the means for the end. We must all continue to pull on our respective ropes, and ply our stoking tools; but the main thing, the question which concerns us all is, the vessel being kept afloat, whither is it shaping its course? Does any one say that is a matter which we must leave to the man at the wheel, or to the officers of the ship? By the leave of such a person, if there be one, we say No. If there is any sense at all in our efforts, any consistency between our professions and our real aims, we are in this war precisely because the men at the wheel and on the bridge have too much assumed that the Ship of State were their private property, and that nations exist to be ruled by them, and not to rule themselves. The end in view, to which the victorious issue of our militant efforts is subsidiary, however necessary, is the uplifting of mankind from barbarism and rapine and sheer lawlessness, to international order, to social justice, and the steady growth of a rational goodwill. Whatever else we have to sacrifice yet, let us not throw any part of this ideal overboard. It is the business of our statesmen in particular to scrutinise very carefully every suggested plan of action, at home, in the Empire, and among the Allies, lest it imperil the very things we meant and still mean, under Providence, to secure.

TRUST GOD.

BY THE LATE REV. CHARLES HARGROVE,
D.Litt.

RELIGION is to feel and act towards God as a child towards a wise and good father, whose ways with himself he cannot understand—much less his larger life of business and study and public affairs. All this, the grown-up man and his concerns, are utterly beyond the child's utmost grasp, and if he tries to tell of them his talk is only nursery chatter. But one thing he does know, that his father may be trusted to the uttermost, trusted in the dark as in the light, trusted when he does what seems most strange, even when he turns away his face in displeasure or lets his hand fall in chastisement. Even so inscrutable, immeasurably above him, does the devout man feel his God to be, and even so does he trust Him, come what may, and this trust is his religion, whatever else, much or little, he may add to it.

And when from our private doubts and troubles we free ourselves, and survey mankind and reckon up its sorrows and sins and sufferings, here and everywhere, in our own time, and throughout all the past of which history keeps record, when "the weary weight of all this unintelligible world" lies heavy on our souls, "and the burden of the mystery" overwhelms us, so that we are tempted to cry "God can't help it or God doesn't care," then what other resort have we but this of faith? "We would have things otherwise had we but the power," we say, but we know so little and what we do know is so little of all that is. We judge as a foolish boy who enters an engineer's workshop, and complains of the noise and smell and danger, and seeming uselessness of all the movement and uproar, for what comes of it while he waits and watches a whole hour or even longer? But the master knows, and the mighty engines, which take us swiftly over sea and land, are the outcome of this seeming confusion.

And God knows the meaning of the world. The force which fills and animates all, which glows in sun and star, and shimmers on the butterfly's wing, is not inferior to the life which moves in us and makes us men; and if we have some measure of providence and wisdom and goodwill, He has it in infinite fullness.

LOVE IS YET SUPREME.

"I HAVE been crucified with Christ.... who loved me, and gave himself for me." So Paul wrote to the Galatians, recounting his experience which brought him into the Christian service. "And it is no longer I that live, but Christ liveth in me." So complete was the surrender of his discipleship, and his sense of union with Christ in the spirit of self-sacrifice, in devoted labours, in suffering and endurance, in love of the brethren, and in the ardour of his vision of the coming glory.

What we find at the heart of that experience is the essential meaning of Christianity, as a redeeming and uplifting power, which binds men together in a true fellowship, cleansing and ennobling, in humility and self-surrender, in fearless courage to withstand the force of evil, in love that is unwearied in well-doing and floods the world with a new glory. It is a practical experience which we must claim, each one for ourselves. Its most vital truth, that Love is the greatest of all, whether in the humblest or the loftiest place, is to be realised simply by living in that spirit.

There are those to-day who say that it is impossible, because of the immeasurable horrors of this time, and the overwhelming tragedy of the war—some who say it with the scoffing of a superficial mind, others in despair, because the burden is too great and the darkness too deep, with the torn heart of human love and sympathy. But ultimately Love goes deeper than all argument, searching all mysteries, enduring all things. It penetrates the darkness, and brings a purer, holier thought into the bitterness. Our true refuge is in the surrendered spirit, in absolute loyalty, that will hold to the right at all cost of suffering, undismayed in the face of death. We are to do justly, to love mercy, and to walk humbly with our God. In the pure desire to bring help and blessing to other lives we are on the threshold of the mystery. In lowly places of human love and faithfulness that greatest gift of life is constantly given. Think of any one instance of self-sacrifice for Love's sake, in single-hearted loyalty, however humble the place or the occasion, and the deepest truth of God is there, clearly demonstrated to the heart of Love, which responds to that appeal. On how many nameless graves to-day, in desolate fields of conflict, might not those words be inscribed for a memorial: "Greater Love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friend." There, to the understanding heart the meaning is unmistakable, a demonstration of the spirit, with overmastering conviction, of the absolute truth of life, the truth of God—Love the very heart of the Eternal Goodness, the power of God over all. There is the light which penetrates the darkness of bitterest agony, strong to endure, with immortal hope, with healing power—life triumphant over death.

If that vision is granted us, and in complete surrender we can say with Paul, "I have been crucified with Christ," and with that other disciple, "Greater Love hath no man than this," then we can endure, and know that beyond the darkness of the storm the light of God still is there. Baser things shall not hold us, nor bring us to confusion, nor cast down our hope.

Nay, forbid it heaven!
We know the arduous strife, the eternal laws
To which the triumph of all good is given,
High sacrifice, and labour without pause,
Even to the death:—else wherefore should the eye
Of man converse with immortality.

Unbounded is the might
Of martyrdom, and fortitude and right.

Thou hast great allies,
Thy friends are exultations, agonies,
And love, and man's unconquerable mind.

"Now abideth faith, hope, Love, these three: and the greatest of these is Love."

V. D. D.

THE BROTHERS OF THE CROSS.

AUGUST 4, 1914—1918,

In Piam Memoriam.

We may not build to our dear dead an altar;

We cannot consecrate to them a shrine;

We dedicate ourselves, nor will we falter,
To serve the Cause they served, and
"hold the line."

To give his son—the first-born of a nation—

A father climbed the mount of sacrifice;

So by the Cross a mother kept her station:

Ours be it thus to give, nor grudge the price.

Never again shall that stern Cross of Jesus,

Whereon supremest sacrifice He made,
Be but a charm from pains of hell to ease us—

A pledge of cancelled debt we have not paid.

Are there not still, in whatsoever "city"
To true disciples comes the call sublime,

A "hill without the wall"—a cross of pity—

An altar which the sons of God must climb?

So these our friends, our husbands, sons, and brothers,

Went forth without the camp, with Him to bear

Grief, loss, and pain; then, laying down for others

Ev'n life itself, His "Greater Love" to share.

What though some knew Him not, nor ever reckoned

The Christ whom creeds and churches preach was He—

The Man of men—whose unseen finger beckoned

To fight for God's fair kingdom that shall be—

Yet knows He each by name, and gives them greeting

As friends and brothers, since they died to save—

Scarce knowing why, till that revealing meeting—

He, unknown Captain; they, His soldiers brave.

For us they died and for the glad Hereafter:

Bright be their Roll of Honour, tear-bedewed;

That children's children, born to happy laughter,

May lisp their names with love and gratitude

With evergreen heart's-love, and gratitude.

BOOKS AND REVIEWS.

ROBERT COLLYER.*

"ROBERT COLLYER," says his biographer, the Rev. John Haynes Holmes, "is become a legend. His life is a tale upon men's lips, a song within their hearts. Were there chroniclers to-day, it would be a story like that of Christopher or Francis: were there minstrels, it would be a ballad like that of Roland. But if there be no chroniclers or minstrels in our prosaic times, there are still men's hungry and thirsty souls; and these to-day, as yesterday, will not let die what they have found of good."

In the two finely illustrated volumes presented by Mr. Holmes materials are preserved which will undoubtedly help to keep the good alive for generations to come. Collyer had himself happily given the world much of his story in autobiographical sketches and lectures, and the copious extracts from his letters here published richly supplement this first-hand evidence. Specially valuable is the correspondence carried on during over forty years with the Methodist minister under whose influence he was "converted," the Rev. Flesher Bland. Besides these sources a large amount of printed matter, collected by Dr. Collyer and his family and by other friends, has been of service in preparing the biography. Added to all this is the personal testimony borne by Mr. Holmes, his co-pastor during the last five and half years of his life. The book, so far as we are able to test it, has been carefully compiled; some English names are slightly misspelled, but that is no great matter, and may very well be due to Collyer's own confessed weakness in spelling. In his enthusiasm for his subject, the biographer somewhat indulges in a picturesque eloquence; but few who catch the infection of the theme—and who will not?—will be disposed to regret a manner which is, indeed, more appropriate to the task in hand than a more measured style would be.

Who, we ask, could be unmoved in dealing with a life-story so truly romantic? The Yorkshire boy, born to barest poverty, yet "well-born," as he said, having health in his bones and the natural piety of mother's love largely about him from his cradle; the Yorkshire youth alive on all sides, for a time perilously so; with less than two years' elementary schooling, but educated all his years in touch with nature on the rugged moors and in the stream-valleys of his native county, ready to talk and listen, and eager above all to read whatever came in his way; the vigorous workman, great-limbed and independently looking the whole world in the face—this is the beginning. The end is a patriarchal presence, a silvered head honoured in two lands, a look wise and shrewd, yet kindly as sunshine and welcomed by every one; behind being a record of manly struggle toward self-maintenance alike of body and mind, of warm and fruitful love of his fellow-creatures, especially the lowly and suffering, and of words that aptly matched so strong and gracious a humanity and flew abroad bearing the healing touch of his manly faith to innumerable hearts. Between these two, the opening and closing, lies the fact of a long life, with some bitter pains and with a few tragedies, but for the most part answering to the description in Holy Writ, "shining more and more unto the perfect day."

The perusal of the story of this life, here at last formally told, cannot reveal much that was not already known in substance—birth in a lowly Keighley cottage in 1823, boyhood near Ilkley, youth in a smithy, early marriage and loss of first wife, second marriage and emigration to America, hard life but studious, and by degrees less hard, Methodist preaching, heretical doubts, a Unitarian ministry at large at Chicago (1859), ministry of Unity Church there (1860), the Civil War, success as a popular preacher, the Great Fire (1871), loss and rebuilding of his church, removal to Church of Messiah, New York (1879), ministry there till his death (1912),—such in outline is the familiar record. But the book before us undoubtedly adds to one's sense of the real man.

There is a danger lest our venerated elders should be enshrined in a casket of jewelled memories—and in a manner shelved apart from the actual life we ordinary mortals share. When Cromwell insisted that his portrait should give "warts and all" he was on the right track, provided always that our artists do not fall victim to the realism that would paint human nature all warts. Here and there we perceive, with satisfaction, that when Collyer was not as yet a haloed figure in a picture he was a very muscular person. He was truly a "poet-preacher" from the first, but he could speak plainest prose on occasion, and now and then he could be gruff enough to startle folk. He had Yorkshire "grit" in his composition. It enabled him to battle with poverty, to persevere against social disadvantages, to enter manfully into the responsibilities of church leadership and management, to speak out as a citizen on the subjects that divided men then as ours do to-day, to fling himself into war-work—as many of our men are now doing—to build and rebuild his church and maintain a mission to the poor, to travel far and lecture incessantly, and to bear up bravely when age inevitably impaired his powers and disaster suddenly robbed him of a ministerial companionship upon which he had confidently relied for the closing years. If men are to do heavy work they must have hard core in them, and Collyer had it and now and then showed it.

And yet when all is told, nothing extenuated, what a truly noble type emerges! Mr. Holmes in his careful and suggestive study of "the secret" at the close of his book, points once more to the contrasts of Collyer's life, on the one hand his humble origin and his hardships and loneliness, on the other his triumphant close as a "distinguished clergyman and author clad in his scholar's robes of the University of Leeds...beloved of thousands in England and America," and wonders where to find the right "key" to the mystery of such a career. Without "genius," no theologian or scholar, no orator even in the stricter sense of the word, not "abreast of the age" (as the phrase is) so far as to seize and be seized by the great scientific, Biblical, or economic movements of his time, he achieved a position and influence far beyond the reach of others more intellectually gifted. If any of us, wisely ambitious, consider the greatness of this Methodist preacher turned Unitarian, and desire, if it were possible, to copy his method and aim at similar work, we shall evidently need to be circumspect. To "succeed" so conspicuously, and yet have so little school and no college at all—is not this contrary to every rule of prudence? How "explain" these things?

Well, perhaps, in spite of Mr. Holmes's useful guidance, we may have to give the problem up. Phillips Brooks said "the more of a man a man is the more secret is the secret of his life"; and Collyer was a good deal of a man. Mr. Holmes says "fundamentally a strong man," and expressly warns us from judging wrongly in recalling, as we all do, the sweetness and tenderness, the "wonderful smile," the "loving word" of his declining years. He was "tough" rather than "tender" in the centre of him. He had "crudities, even severities" in him; but a native grace of gentleness was there, which religion quickened and brought to beauty, a healthful love of fun, together with a strange shyness that sometimes deepened into fits of depression. He kept in reserve unbroken with even the closest friends his heart's sorrows, both in youth and maturer years. Very strong, very sensitive, and always naturally and spontaneously simple—such, we are told, was this man. And from these and similar hints readers in after years must do their best to realise him as his hearers did. He was once mistaken for an actor and greatly enjoyed the joke of "keeping it up" with the blunderer. This in common with the public performer he too had, that when all is said by those who saw and heard him, the precise "man" can never be recovered. At best the sympathetic reader who did not know him can but catch an imperfect feeling of what he was. But even when we say we have "known" a man in the flesh how secret still is the secret of his life!

Mr. Holmes's book is a good and serviceable piece of work, albeit long, as most biographies tend to be, and he deserves hearty thanks. If laymen are wise they will see that their ministers shall not lack its unique interest and stimulus for want of a guinea. Books, they say, are to be taxed as luxuries—surely not such books. They are a necessity as every live parson knows.

FREE CHURCHES AND THE STATE. By T. Bennett, LL.D., B.A. (Lond.). 4s. net.

THIS little treatise, reprinted, with additions, from The Law Quarterly Review, states with clearness and conciseness the general legal principles which govern the position of the Free Churches within the State. Incidentally some interesting statutes and legal decisions relating to Free Churches are mentioned, but the author's main object is to make his public realise that Free Churches are from the legal point of view merely voluntary associations for religious purposes, and that Free Churches (when the term is not used as a shortened phrase for Evangelical Free Churches) are all those churches not established by law. The Roman Catholic Church is a Free Church in Great Britain; the Anglican Church is a Free Church in Scotland (where the Presbyterian Church is established by law), in Ireland, or in South Africa. A useful little pamphlet of law for the layman expressed in accurate language, its scope and purpose are confined within narrow limits.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE RESIGNATION OF THE EDITOR.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—I think it is due to the readers of THE INQUIRER who have supported me so loyally while I have been editor and especially during these difficult years of war that I should explain that I have felt it my duty to undertake the only form of active service with our army in France which is open to a man of my age. I have only resigned in order to do other work in the same sense as a soldier resigns his civilian occupation in order to take part in the defence of his country. When it became clear to me where my duty lay I applied for leave of absence for the duration of the war, and as an alternative offered my resignation. The Directors felt unable to grant this leave of absence, and I have accordingly resigned. I believe that in taking this course I am not only accepting my plain duty as a citizen but am also serving the highest interests of religion and freedom to the best of my power. I cease to be responsible for the conduct of THE INQUIRER with lively feelings of gratitude for all the help and friendship which I have received from so many quarters, and not least for the generous support given to our Belgian Hospital Fund. May this support be continued in rich measure now that some other pen than mine must plead its cause.—Yours, &c.,

WM. H. DRUMMOND.

JOHN POUNDS' HOUSE, PORTSMOUTH.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—At the meeting of the Unitarian Historical Society held in May last it was decided to raise a small sum for necessary repairs for the preservation of the little shop where John Pounds, the Unitarian cobbler of Portsmouth, held the first "Ragged School." Some years ago the property was purchased by a few Unitarians and is now held in the name of trustees, the title deeds being at present deposited for safe keeping at the Portsmouth Town Hall. It is estimated that necessary repairs will cost about £12 and it is proposed to place a tablet or inscription upon the building stating the reason for the preservation of this little unused shop. A note in THE INQUIRER having made known the intention to ask for funds has already brought a response in the shape of £1 from Sir John Kirk, the Secretary of the Ragged School Union, and two sums of 5s. from members of the U.H.S., Mr. Tasker of Chester and "W. W." of Newport, Isle of Wight.

On behalf of the Society I now appeal for a sum of £15 or £16 to carry out this proposal. Any balance beyond the sum required will be applied to some special piece of similar work which the Society hopes to undertake as opportunities arise.—Yours, &c.,

WHERE IS THE RELIGIOUS CENTRE?

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—I find myself in sympathy with Mr. Capleton's statement of his position as a Christian Theist, but I hope I may be permitted to explain my use of the word "revolt." When the charge of "sectarianism" is brought it suggests at least a narrowness of spirit. I am not going to plead that I am altogether guiltless. I depends on the sense of the term. If it be sectarian to be proud of being in the line of ministers who have served with ability and earnestness the churches to which I am privileged to minister, then no one is more sectarian than I am. But if by the term is meant a desire to be exclusive and to hinder the development of a free spirit, I deny the charge.

No doubt, the word "revolt" is unfortunate, because it indicates a renunciation of allegiance to some lawful authority, but I supposed it was quite innocent, because evidently no such lawful authority exists in our midst. I imagined also that I had made this quite clear when I stated in my second letter that "I am prepared for any revolt which will help the world to a higher level of thought and worship."

Used in the sense in which I employed it, as a deliberate break from the theological tendency of our churches, I am prepared to stand by the term, for it is a simple statement of fact. Ours is a movement with a history, and a movement which has made acknowledged contributions to the religious thought of the world. Our message has changed with the decades, but we have always had a message. As I read the history of the last two hundred and fifty years, I perceive a clear line of development from Calvinism through the so-called Arianism of the eighteenth century to Unitarianism. To-day we regard Calvinism and Unitarianism as belonging to different families, but there is a generic connection between them. By one of the customary ironies of history, Calvin's doctrine of Revelation furthered the development of the Unitarian principle as stated by Martineau: "Reason is the ultimate appeal, the supreme tribunal, to the test of which even Scripture must be brought." Calvin with his logical acumen saw that before a man could be damned he must have committed wilful sin. In his 'Institutes,' therefore, he maintains that there is knowledge enough of God in every human being to prevent the most wicked from putting in the plea of ignorance. In modern language, as the Unitarian holds, the religious centre is in the soul of man. But God in His great mercy, according to Calvin, had given man another and a better help, namely, the Scriptures. "Those who are inwardly taught by the Holy Spirit acquiesce implicitly in Scripture." (For a fuller exposition see 'John Calvin,' by Williston Walker, p. 410 f.) This was not only Calvin's position; it was the doctrine of the Reformers generally at the outset. It was through sheer stress of circumstances, through the rifts in Protestantism, that later the infallibility of the Bible was opposed to the infallibility of the Roman Church, and the subjective centre abandoned for one that was objective.

In thus dwelling upon the presence of the Holy Spirit in man, Calvin did not realise all that he was doing. The Calvinists who were our forerunners in the ministry of our Free Churches apparently did. They seized on this Calvinistic doctrine of an inward principle, emphasised, developed, and expanded it, and the result was the Open Trust, individual freedom, and in theology, owing to that freedom, Unitarianism. In such movements as that of Passive Resistance to the Education Act, we have evidence of the triumph of that principle in Nonconformity as a whole.

I trust this will make clear what I mean by the word "revolt." In making the religious centre objective, some among us are taking a tremendous leap clean out of the historic movement of our Free Churches. That movement gives them full liberty to do so. But the leap seems to involve a return to a bondage which is altogether alien to the genius of the movement itself. Candidly I fail to see the historical connection of the theology of some of our ministers with that of their forerunners in the service of our churches, much as they may suppose that they stand in the line of tradition. Baxter's name, for instance, is freely quoted in support of Free Catholicism with its love of ceremonialism, but the most ordinary understanding can recognise that Baxter was not thinking of anything connoted by the word Catholicism to-day, but simply of Catholicity, for which the Unitarian contends with not less zeal than the Free Catholic. It was suggested to me only the other day by one whom we respect and who was the teacher of some of us that the men who are supposed to be a new school of thought among us have little sympathy with Martineau and a great deal with Tyrrell and French Modernism. Liberalism in Theology and Modernism are not identical, as the diverging tendencies among us already show. It is too early to judge of their differences, for both are yet in their infancy. But certain differences are apparent. Historically speaking, one conception of religious progress has come out of Roman Catholicism and the other out of Protestantism. The tendency of the one is to seek authority where the Catholic has always sought it, in the Church, and the tendency of the other is to find it in the soul of man.

Another friend has written to me that his thought on this subject of the Religious Centre has been refreshed by reading again Martineau's sermon on 'The God of the Living.' A quotation from this may perhaps be permitted. "In this great saying—'God is the God of the Living'—Jesus seems to be thinking aloud, and we overhear the very essence of his religion; and a Church that is to speak for him and bear his name must dedicate its pavement as a place of immediate meeting, without even himself between, of the human spirit with the Divine. When he himself came first for this very end, to leave us alone with God, and retired to make the audience more solemn, it were a poor thing to call him back in frustration of his own work, instead of yielding to his faith, living his life, and praying his prayer" ('Essays,' vol. iv. p. 556).—Yours, &c.,

ALFRED HALL.

THE REV. E. W. LUMMIS asks if it is right to assume "one necessary and invariable, or one pre-eminently commendable, point of outlook" for all, and suggests: "Could we not agree to pass a self-denying ordinance, and bind ourselves to refrain from denouncing or refuting error (other than dangerous moral error), and to use the energy so saved partly in announcing our own vital gospel (which is sure to be true, so long as it keeps to genuine experience) and partly in trying to understand those quaint and twisted versions of divine truth that others are earnestly urging?"

THE comments of E. M. Abel on a review in our issue for June 1 cannot now be given space in our columns, but the reviewer will reply direct if an address is sent.

"LET us fight," said Channing the peace-lover, "...to maintain our rights, to obtain an honourable peace. Death awaits us all, and happy is he who meets it in the discharge of this duty."

As a war-measure, two churches respectively Unitarian and Congregational, in Lowell, Mass., united last winter to save fuel. Combination has been so mutually helpful that they are permanently uniting. Each retains control of its own funds, but resources are merged, and their joint name will be All Souls Church, Congregational-Unitarian.

THE foundation stone of a "Hebrew University" has just been laid on Mount Scopus, north-east of Jerusalem.

MEMORIAL NOTICE.

THE REV. WALTER SHORT.

ON July 20, in the neighbourhood of the Marne, as a fighting Captain in the K.O.Y.L.I., Walter Short consummated in his death the service to which he had given himself in November, 1915, and which he passionately believed to be demanded and required of him both by the gospel he was called to preach and the Master he desired to follow. Honesty of purpose, sincerity to conviction, and utter belief in righteousness marked his life and have consecrated his death.

Walter Short was born at Sheffield in 1879, one of many brothers, of whom ultimately four entered the ministry. In early life, along with his brother Fisher, Walter Short was associated with the United Methodist Church, gaining considerable reputation as a boy-speaker and later as a lay-preacher. After a period of severe spiritual conflict he left the Methodists and became very actively connected with the life and work of Upper Chapel, Sheffield. There as lay-preacher and secretary of the Senior Class he exercised a large influence for good, being more and more drawn towards the ministry of religion as his exclusive vocation. In 1903 he entered the Unitarian Home Missionary College, bringing with him an ardent enthusiasm for the work of religion, very considerable capacity as a preacher and speaker, and a large experience of human nature gained in business life. His college career was eminently successful. He took many prizes, and finally graduated B.A. at the University of Manchester. His first pastorate was at Stalybridge where he met with marked success. Being called unanimously to Bootle in 1912, and feeling that three years was a sufficiently long period for a first charge, he left Stalybridge and threw his energies into the ministry at Bootle, at that time difficult and risky, and into the general work of the Liverpool district. Again his energy, zeal and enthusiasm met with due reward. An active, vigorous life rose round him in the Bootle congregation, and his influence as social worker and philanthropic enthusiast was felt, and produced beneficial changes in the town of Bootle itself.

But this fruitful and valuable ministry was, unhappily, not destined to continue for long. The war broke into it, as into so much else, with shattering, critical effect. From the outset, Mr. Short was deeply convinced of the unavoidable necessity for war and of the righteousness of Great Britain's entry into it. Everything in his spirit of ardent idealism led him to envisage the war as a mighty crusade for good against evil, a struggle for the holiest of life's values, in which there could be no other duty than to give all. From this point of view he never swerved. Though the work of religion which he was doing was valuable, and though that value was earnestly impressed on him by his friends, he seemed to himself to see something more valuable, not with another kind of value but with the same kind. As he understood the matter, the time had come when the preaching of the gospel could only be adequately carried through by deeds, even deeds of violence, and the injunction to sacrifice could only be enforced by unfaltering practical example. He felt that he could not bid others go to the battle and himself remain at home. That was his absolute honesty! In November, 1915, he joined the army. After a year's training and waiting he received a commission in the K.O.Y.L.I. In January, 1917, he went out to France, and was at once promoted to a first lieutenantcy. After considerable experience in the trenches he served for several months as captain-adjudant on staff work, returning in the winter of 1917 to the fighting line. He was made a captain in December, 1917, and his original battalion, the 8th, having been practically wiped out, he was transferred to the 5th, with which he remained to the end. Leading his men in the front line he died on July 20.

The virtues which marked Walter Short as a minister remained with him as a soldier, securing for him the respect and admiration of his superiors and equals in rank and the loyalty of his men. He was always cheerful, always zealous, and always enthusiastic. He belongs peculiarly to those who, voluntarily and with full consciousness of what they were doing, gave all that man can give on this earth to a cause which seemed to them the highest and holiest possible. Beloved by his congregation, his death leaves an incredible gap in their lives. The work he might have accomplished for religion becomes a memory and a responsibility, hallowed by the inspiration of his loyalty. His place will be difficult to fill. The affection of many, the respect of all, follow him to his unknown resting-place.

Captain Short leaves a widow, and one little boy, old enough to understand and carry through life the memory of the supreme sacrifice made by his father, to whom he was passionately attached. Profound sympathy will be felt for Mrs. Short, who, during her husband's service with the army, has carried on the work of the Bootle Church with unfailing devotion and rare courage.

FROM A LIVERPOOL CORRESPONDENT.

"RELIGION and war are strange bed-fellows, but that soldier who has chivalry and idealism achieves peace even in conflict, and enjoys the fruits of a good conscience, and the blessing of the Most High." These are Walter Short's last words to his people written in the August Calendar of his church. And now, almost before the printer's ink is dry, he too is dead. With hatred of war as deep as that of any good man, with a love of peace greater than that of some men who are forever mouthing the word, thrusting aside all sophistry and special pleading, he embraced the stark duty and went forth and did it. He was not concerned with saving either his own body or his own soul. He was concerned with the saving of the world. So he went out into the nightmare of mud and blood, away from the home-love which bravely bade him go and carried on alone; and he will return to that and to us no more.

In Liverpool we have spoken little of his great sacrifice. Some of us probably did not realise it. And those of us who realised it most said least. There are some things which it is impossible to praise. One does not praise the man who loved his Ideal more than his wife, more than his little son, more than all the safeties and comforts of life, more than life itself, more than any boon of love and youth. We knew that he was one of that most precious race on earth, the men who love much. We saw him, because he loved so much, leave all he loved. Still we said nothing. What was there to say? And he was only one of the vast army of dedicated youth, and heroism became commonplace. So we were silent, and now we break the silence to cry Hail and Farewell. We break it to say that we are proud beyond expression. Through him we attain to that state of mind which is victory; uplifted high in heart and hope are we. Through him and such as he we pass beyond "the long littleness of life" for a brief space into something rich and strange. We thank him in that he has died for the great side of human nature and so proved it to us. We shall not forget that; and we shall not forget him. "Peace even in conflict, and the blessing of the Most High."

A CHURCH PARADE IN FRANCE.

[THE following 'Pen Picture from France' which appears in the Bootle Free Church Calendar for August, was written by the minister of the church, the late Capt. Walter Short. He had already sent home several other similar sketches, some of which have been quoted in our columns, but this one, with its characteristic final sentence, was destined to be his last message to those who loved and honoured him].

My little son, in his last letter to me, asked what hymns we sing at our services, and so it occurs to me that a short description of a Parade Service will be of general interest.

July 7th was a beautiful day, and it seemed in keeping that we should emerge from our tents and march to a bright field bounded by lofty poplars, and there pay homage to our Maker. Was it equally in keeping that my first parade after again assuming command of "A" Co. (this time as Captain) should be a Church Parade? I felt it a kind of consecration.

Our Anglican Padre, whom we share with another battalion, hails from St. Helens, and has won my regard by his devotion to duty. When I was in support a short time ago he visited me in a shelled area and asked if he might conduct a service in the dug-out. (We were going into the front line that evening.) Some days later he called on me again and obtained permission to visit any men in my trenches who could be got at in daylight. Such a man commands respect. Canon Mitchell of Wavertree, whom I met the other day, speaks very highly of him.

Mood is everything when attending a Church Parade. I was in the mood to be influenced by this strong manly padre and circumstances supported mood. Our feet didn't lag on the way to church for we marched to the spirited music of the band, which presently led us when singing "O God our help in ages past." Then came an abbreviated form of the Morning Service, including the General Confession and Absolution; "Venite"; Lesson; Apostles' Creed and Collects. In the "Prayer in time of War" the sentence "particularly for men of this Battalion" occurred. And in the "Prayer for Absent Friends" the petition was made—"May they never forget us, and we never forget them." The middle hymn was "The Church's one foundation is Jesus Christ our Lord." Then followed a brief address based on the story of Cornelius, the Roman Centurion, who sent to Simon the Tanner's house for the Apostle Peter. Just as God knew all about people like Simon, said the Preacher, He knows about us—and He sees; He understands; He cares. Also he knows about our loved ones at home. This was given "as a message of good cheer," and such it was. The closing hymn was "Jesu, Lover of my soul," followed by Benediction and the national anthem. In marching away to the strains of the Band one gave the C.O. a smart "Eyes right" and returned to Camp feeling much better.

Religion and War are strange bed-fellows, but that soldier who has chivalry and idealism, achieves peace even in conflict, and enjoys the fruits of a good conscience, and the blessing of the Most High.

WALTER SHORT, Capt.
B.E.F., France. K.O.Y.L.I.
July 13th, 1918.

PROFESSOR CLAYTON R. BOWEN, of Meadville, whose college work is New Testament Interpretation thus concludes an examination of the question, "Would Jesus Christ hate the Germans?"—"If Jesus were here now he would give every ounce of his being to destroy what Germany stands for in this war. But he would not hate the Germans."

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Belfast.—Mr. William Bennett, a member of the First Presbyterian Church, Rosemary Street, succumbed to an attack of influenza at Bangor, where he was staying for the benefit of his health, on July 7. Mr. Bennett, who was only forty-nine, was well-known in business and public circles in Belfast, and belonged to the First Presbyterian Church, Rosemary Street. Clough.—The death is announced of Mr. Hugh Robinson, in his 81st year. He was a man of rare qualities, with a cheerful, kindly, and sympathetic disposition, who had travelled widely in early life and served his neighbourhood faithfully and well in many capacities. A member of the Non-subscribing Presbyterian Church, he attended the services regularly, and had been for many years a member of the Committee.

Bolton.—Special prayers in time of war to be used at the services on August 4 (fourth anniversary of declaration of war) are included in the Bank Street Chapel Calendar for this month. United services, under the auspices of the Bolton District Christian Council, will be held in various places of worship, and at each one clergy and ministers from all denominations will take part. In the evening, at 8.15, a great open-air service will be held on the Town Hall steps.—Lance-Corporal Jack Berry has died of wounds in hospital in France.

Bootle.—The death is announced in another column of Capt. Walter Short, minister of the Bootle Free Church, who has been killed in action in France. On Sunday, August 4, special memorial services will be held at the church, the Rev. John Ellis, of Stalybridge, being the preacher in the morning, and the Rev. J. Collins Odgers in the evening.

Billingshurst.—A most successful sale of work was held on Monday, July 29, opened by Mrs. E. R. Fyson, of Ilford. On the previous Sunday Mr. Fyson, President of the Provincial Assembly, conducted the service both morning and evening. The sale realised nearly £40, and was largely attended. In the afternoon and evening musical items were rendered, and under the trees, before a delighted audience of 100 people, scenes from 'Henry V.' and 'Kenilworth' were acted by London pupils of the minister, the Rev. N. Maguire.

Chowbent.—The Sunday School field day was held on Saturday, July 19. By arrangement with the Local Food Control Committee tea was served in the schoolroom to 200 of the younger children. There was a goodly band of willing workers, the Rev. J. J. Wright presiding. Nuts and toys and other gifts were distributed later on, and games and sports in a field lent for the occasion were much enjoyed.

Gee Cross.—A commemoration window has been placed in Hyde Chapel, Gee Cross, to mark the fifty years' ministry of the Rev. H. Enfield Downson.

Great Hucklow.—The two hundred and twenty-second anniversary services were held last Sunday when the pastor, the Rev. Charles Peach, officiated. Great interest was taken in the event by residents and visitors, and the old chapel was well filled at both services.

Knutsford.—The Treasurer of Brook Street Chapel having recently intimated that it is desirable that an additional sum of £20 a year should be raised in order to make up for losses by death and removal, and to re-decorate the school, an old member and friend has generously sent a cheque for £25, which he says is contributed by "one who looks back with happy recollections to the teaching of a simple, pure and rational religion within its walls."

Liverpool: Ullet Road.—As we announced a week or two ago, during the Rev. L. Redfern's absence on Y.M.C.A. work, Ullet Road Church and the Ancient Chapel will temporarily amalgamate. The morning service will be held at the Ancient chapel, at 11 a.m., and the evening service at Ullet Road Church at 6.30 p.m., preacher, the Rev. C. M. Wright.—The teachers of the Sunday School, when it re-opens on Sunday, Sept. 1, will start a series of lessons on "The Land of Palestine in the light of the recent Campaign." Mr. Redfern hopes to commence a Teachers' Preparation Class on his return.

London: Mansford Street.—A very successful Flower Show and Industrial Exhibition was held at the Mansford Street Mission on July 18. There were 121 plants, and nearly 50 samples of work exhibited; 38 competitors, arranged in three sections, entered for the table and vase decorations. These were judged by Miss Alice Longhurst, the plants by Mr. Ellis, and the children's essays (17 in number), by Mr. R. M. Montgomery, K.C. The work exhibited by the members of the sewing class was judged by Mrs. Alfred Thompson. Mr. R. M. Montgomery presided, and the prizes were distributed by Mrs. Montgomery. During the evening a silver rose bowl was presented to Mr. W. J. Clark, in appreciation of the faithful services he had rendered to the church as organist and choir master for nearly 28 years.

Loughborough.—At a garden party which was held in the grounds of Mr. and Mrs. Swindall's home on Saturday, July 20, a welcome was given to the Rev. W. M. Long by the members and friends of Victoria Street Church, of which he is now the minister. Cordial addresses were delivered by Alderman William Moss, J.P., Mrs. Swindall, Mr. Oldham, and Mr. Simpkin, to which Mr. Long responded. Good congregations attended the Sunday School Anniversary services next day, when Mr. Long began his ministry.

Manchester.—The Committee of the Manchester District Association of Presbyterian and Unitarian Churches, at their first meeting after the death of the late Rev. H. C. Horsley, M.A., passed a resolution expressing their sincere sympathy with his relatives in their bereavement, and their deep regret that a ministry of such great promise should be so soon cut short by his death, which is a serious loss, not only to the church of Moss Side, but to the Association generally.

Manchester: Lower Moseley Street.—The Sunday Schools' Roll of Honour contains 70 names, though we understand it is not yet complete. Of these 16 have been killed and 3 have died of wounds.

Sheffield: Unity Chapel.—The Rev. J. Vint Laughland, who has resigned his ministry of Unity Church, Islington, has accepted a unanimous invitation from the congregation of Unity Church, Sheffield, for a period of six months. This limited time has been arranged owing to the fact that Mr. Laughland's health, and the possibility of a further call from overseas, may prevent him from remaining longer.—Eight or nine of the Unity Church Boy Scouts are doing their "bit" by helping in the Flax Harvest.

Sheffield: Upper Chapel.—The Rev. C. J. Street has now given up pastoral and institutional work in connection with Upper Chapel, though he will preach and give personal oversight when he feels able to do so. He is going to live in the country in semi-retirement, and the Rev. Alfred Hall begins his ministry as Mr. Street's colleague to-morrow, Aug. 4.—Two more members of the Roll of Honour have received distinctions for services in the field; 2nd Lieut. S. E. Warburton, who already held the Military Medal, has since gained the Military Cross, and Private Sydney Rhodes is recommended for the Military Medal.

Stannington.—The quarterly meeting of the District Association was held on July 13 at Stannington. The Rev. H. McLachlan, owing to influenza, was unfortunately prevented from delivering his promised lecture, but Mr. Elise stepped into the breach and gave an excellent address on "Russia." Mr. Elise has resided in Russia for several years, and knows something at first hand of her terrible experiences.

 Secretaries of churches which publish Calendars are requested to send the Calendars regularly, and as soon as possible after publication, to the Editor.*

 THE INQUIRER welcomes items of news likely to be of special interest to its readers, and is ready to pay for such news when accepted by the Editor, the scale depending upon its importance and suitability in form and matter for insertion. All contributions should be addressed to the Editor, INQUIRER Office, 13 Bream's Buildings, London, E.C.4, and should be received not later than the first post on Wednesday morning in each week.*

OUR ROLL OF HONOUR.

FURTHER additions and corrections have been received from Miss N. Cox (Windermere), the Rev. William Hall (Northampton), the Rev. E. Savell Hicks (Dublin), and Mr. A. McCann (Lower Moseley Street Schools).

BIRTH.

SMITH.—On July 30, at Boscobel, Derby Road, Withington, to M. and E. Neville Smith, of Albany Road, Victoria Park, Manchester, a son.

MARRIAGE.

MONKS — HEPHERD.—On July 25, at St. Wilfrid's, Grappenhall, by the Rector, Rev. H. V. Pigot, M.A., Captain Austin J. Monks (4th South Lancashire Regiment), younger son of Mr. and Mrs. F. W. Monks, Stonecroft, Appleton, Warrington, to Marjorie, elder daughter of Mr. and Mrs. James Hephherd, Heathfield, Grappenhall.

DEATH.

SHORT.—Killed in action on July 20, Captain Walter Short, K.O.Y.L.I. (Minister of Bootle Free Church), beloved husband of Rosa Short (née Abbott), 20 St. Alban's Road, Bootle, Liverpool, aged 39.—"Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends."

OUT OF THE HEART OF THE STORM.

Twelve Sermons preached at Rosslyn Hill Chapel
Hampstead, and Manchester College, Oxford.

BY

Rev. HENRY GOW, B.A.

The sermons are written by one who believes with President Wilson that "right is more precious than peace," and that no personal sorrow or loss should discourage us and turn us from our firm resolve to overthrow the Prussian autocracy. They are written too in the growing confidence that faith in God and in the supremacy of Love has become more and not less possible and real through the conflict and agony of recent times.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

All letters and manuscripts for the Editor should be sent to 13 Bream's Buildings, Fetter Lane, London, E.C.4. They must reach the Editor not later than Wednesday morning for publication the same week.

THE national temper on the opening of the fifth year of war, so far as it may be judged from the utterances of prominent men and their reception by the public, is one of unshaken resolve to continue the struggle until the oppressor's arm is broken and the enemy of the world's peace is convinced of the error of his ways. The different speakers have phrased this resolution in their respectively characteristic ways, from Mr. Lloyd George and Mr. Winston Churchill to Mr. Asquith and the Labour representatives. The clergy and ministers appear, so far as they are reported, to have repeated the same note, though with accents appropriate to their high vocation and solemn responsibility. The Archbishop of Canterbury and the Master of the Temple made specially weighty appeal to the nation not to surrender the high ideals with which it entered into the war.

MR. HENDERSON'S words, typical in the main, we believe, of the thoughts of the great majority of Labour leaders, may be quoted here: "Of this I am convinced: if the workers, indispensable in war as in peace, have the assurance that we remain in the war in order to fulfil the same obligations and vindicate the same principles for which the nation made its departure from the ways of peace in August, 1914, and that national honour and future security can only be safeguarded by a continuance of the struggle, they will respond to the end in the spirit they have displayed from the beginning. Labour has always regarded the task imposed upon us as one which can only be fully justified by the elimination of the spirit of militarism from the world, the abandonment of competitive armaments and enforced military service. Labour will never sacrifice the right of mankind in order to appease the selfish desires of German Imperialism, but is anxious to secure the co-operation of German Social Democracy in the great task of reconstructing civilisation on the basis of a righteous and enduring democratic peace. It is in this spirit we go forward."

* * *

SIR ROLAND WILSON, whose notice of the Indian Report is presented in our issue this week, writes as an expert in Indian law as well as an experienced publicist. One point is noteworthy here, viz., Mr. Montagu's statement on Tuesday that the inception of the Report is not to be credited to him, but to his predecessor, Mr. Austen Chamberlain. —We hope to present next week a survey by a prominent educationist of the new position due to the passing this week of Mr. Fisher's Education Act. At present we can but express in a word our profound gratitude for the emergence of this great scheme from the perils that have wrecked so many of its predecessors. It will be a landmark, we believe, not only in the history of our schools, but of our whole population—if only it is worked by men imbued with the spirit of its originator.

* * *

THE rejection of the Lotteries Bill in the House of Commons on Tuesday, though by a small majority, is a very welcome sign. In spite of powerful social backing for the proposal the Government were obviously uneasy about forcing it through, and not only was the question left "open" for members to vote as they pleased, but its official supporters exhibited small enthusiasm for it. The fate that has befallen this singularly unhappy attempt to reverse a policy deliberately pursued for a century past should give pause to any future advocacy of the kind. In addition to the protest of the Archbishop of Canterbury to which we referred last week, the Bishops of Winchester and Norwich, among others, emphatically opposed the Bill; and we may be quite sure that in workshops and public-houses there has been some pretty plain speaking about the idea that what is penal in connection with sport is praiseworthy in connection with charity. It was urged on behalf of the Bill that lotteries are, in fact, frequently held. As the law stands, the promoters are liable to prosecution as "rogues and vagabonds."

MR. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN has presented Highbury, Moor Green, Birmingham, to that city. The house is probably well-known to readers in the Midlands as the residence of the late Mr. Joseph Chamberlain where, in years gone by, that gentleman hospitably welcomed large gatherings from time to time. For over three years it has been used as a V.A.D. military hospital, and an adjoining house—Uffculme—which has also been given to the city by Mr. and Mrs. Barrow Cadbury, will now be linked with it as a hospital for limbless and chronic orthopaedic cases. When no longer needed for this purpose they are to be put to such public use as the City Council think fit.

* * *

THE Divinity Alumni Association at Harvard, at its annual meeting in June, was addressed by Prof. Ephraim Emerton on the subject of 'A Generation of History.' His selection of this theme was obviously due to his retirement at the close of the session from his position as Winn Professor of Ecclesiastical History in the Divinity School, and those readers in England who know his extremely valuable book, 'Unitarian Thought,' will be glad to learn that in recognition of his thirty-six years' service he has been appointed Professor Emeritus. He declared that whatever changes might now commend themselves to him the fundamental principle with which he started would be the same had he to start anew, viz.: that Church history should be treated as a department of general history, its sources being studied and interpreted in the same manner as in the modern scientific treatment of history in general.

AMONG those who spoke for their respective Classes were Dr. W. C. Gannett (1868) and Frederick L. Hosmer (1869). The former gave an address on

'Fifty Years out of the Divinity School,' in the course of which he put and answered three questions: (1) "What were the great problems of my generation?" "The new Bible," he said, "evolution and the social consciousness." (2) "Would I be a minister again?" "I would if I dared." (3) "What are you doing now?" "Thanking, repenting, trusting." One can imagine how such a choice spirit would enlarge on these points, and it is no wonder that a deep hush came upon all at the close. It fell to the poet, Hosmer, to break the silence with an acknowledgment to "one who combined in himself the priest and the prophet," and to add his own word as to the supreme satisfactions of the ministry in spite of all difficulties and disappointments.

It will be seen from the 'News of the Churches' that the Rev. T. P. Spedding has accepted the cordial invitation of the congregation at Mansfield to become their minister. Mr. Spedding was appointed Missionary Agent for the British and Foreign Unitarian Association in 1907. His special work during the summer months was the organisation and development of the Unitarian Van Mission. This work he carried on with characteristic enthusiasm until the outbreak of the war, four years ago, brought it to a close. He has since been mainly occupied in visiting Home Camps in different parts of England, and in carrying out special missionary duties as occasion called. The difficulties of successful visitation have greatly increased of late owing to frequent movements of men from the camps to the front; and the Committee of the Association had planned some further missionary work for him at Manchester and elsewhere, but he has decided at this point to return to the regular ministry. Our religious community is deeply indebted to Mr. Spedding for his whole-hearted devotion to the Van Mission and the other missionary work entrusted to him by the Association. The gratitude and good wishes of our people will accompany him to his new field of labour, where his experience of men and movements will prove no small gain to the congregation and to the North Midland District.

* * *

WE are asked to announce that arrangements have been concluded to let Summerville, the building of the Unitarian Home Missionary College, to the Manchester University for a period of a year, as a Hostel for Women Students, the accommodation at Ashbourne Hall having proved insufficient to meet the requirements of women now applying for professional courses of study at the University. The Library will remain under the supervision of the Warden. Lectures will be given by the Principal and Warden to students, ministers, and lay preachers at the Memorial Hall. Applications for supply should be addressed to the Principal at the Hall. The Warden will act as locum tenens at Stalybridge for a year during the absence of the Rev. John Ellis on Y.M.C.A. work in France.

VALOUR IN RELIGION.

To be valiant is not to be ignorant of evils that threaten us, but for love of the good to defy them, and to find a strange but certain delight in waging battle with their worst. If a young man entering the army or navy were to pause to call up the vision of the enemy's vast strength and skill he would stand a good chance of catching the disease known among soldiers as "cold feet." A similar fate threatens the religious recruit when he thinks of the mass of devilry in the world. At the present moment it appears to some of us to be growing day by day. In our diminished newspapers, it is true, policy as well as cost confines the daily report of the world's doings within close limits. Nevertheless, if they are at all sensitive to such things people see and hear quite enough of the bad side, enough and to spare. By the bad side we mean the shames and corruptions, the tyrannies, the greeds, the lawlessness, and inhuman levities that appear, we say, to increase and multiply about us. To judge by these symptoms—and how else can we?—the community is infected as with new poison in its blood. Much of the evil is deeply rooted; it existed before the war. But that the war has stimulated chronic propensities and introduced new openings for them is but too evident.

Look at two aspects only of this bad side, one concerned with adult life, the other with the life of the young. As to the latter there need be no exaggerating, but attending only to credible and authoritative witnesses we must admit with deep concern the worsening effects of these four years on many young lives. It is beyond question a most threatening feature of our time, foreshadowing immense difficulties in days to come, when for lack of proper discipline these children will have been spoiled for the remainder of their life. On the other hand there is the obvious canker of money-making. It ranges in its deleterious effects from the mere lavishing of unusual earnings upon absurd purchases and silly "pleasures," to the clutching habit that ultimately overmasters all other considerations and renders a man oblivious of every humane feeling. "Well," said a man, "give us two years more of the war and I shall be set up for the rest of my life." Now and again strange stories—at least they ought to be strange, but they are sadly familiar—are published of the inexplicable vanishing of public monies, and the monstrous profits of companies, often due to "financial operations." A note by The Times' chronicler of sales of rare books tells us that about a hundred new millionaires have been "made" in the United States since 1914. How many there may be in our own country we cannot guess, but (as the poor people say in the markets) "Some one must get all this money." And, just to add the crowning point to this sorry account, we are told that the only way to get people to give freely to the Red Cross is to let them have a sporting chance of winning somebody else's money.

Two aspects only of the evil around us are enough, we say, to glance at just now; and if any knight errant of noble manhood wants more evidence that his knightly valour is all called for he can get it readily. But lest we dishearten one another by too careful a scrutiny of the bad side, let us, in a word, conclude that it is undeniably there, that it is very bad, and that its badness is so real and virile that if the goodness brought to fight against it is not equally real and virile there is going to be worse evil by and by. Let it be granted that the Happy Warrior is not likely—he never was—to find his happiness in having an easy job before him; what we suggest is that religious people will not leave all the valour to be shown on the battlefield. Who will venture to compute how much is lost to religion and morality through the weak and timid behaviour of their champions? But indeed the word "champion" is about the last that is applicable to some of our preachers, and is simply ludicrous in connection with some of our laymen—we say nothing of laywomen, who are admittedly in many cases, and actually in more, the truly vital members of the congregation, resourceful, hopeful, dauntless.

We have spoken of the young. It is their world that is to be saved, if it can be, from the incoming flood of iniquity and meanness and waste. It is their valour, their dash and energy, their swift imagination, their generous impulse, that is required above all in the fight for clean lives, and just dealings, and lovely homes, and nobler manners. They may be, let us declare they shall be, this world's Happy Warriors, by and by, soon; why not now? They will assuredly become so the sooner for living in the company of valiant elders, who reverently but with confidence unshakable, know in Whom they have trusted.

RED CROSS LOTTERIES.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—The work of the Red Cross moves us with sympathy and admiration, for it springs from the noble sources of mercy and pity. But there are some people within the Red Cross management who would sully its claims upon our purer affections by appealing to the sordid passions of the gambler. Checked by the law and by magistrates properly anxious to uphold it, they have been trying to get the law altered to permit Red Cross money-raising by lotteries. If it were true that the stream of charity is drying up, the remedy would not be to provide gambling flutters to make us pay. It would be for the Red Cross to limit its labours to its means. But I do not believe, and few believe, that the streams of charity are failing. It is one of the few redemptions of these evil days to notice how open-handed is generosity in the relief of suffering. It is an insult to the England that is safe at home to say that unless our baser instincts are exploited to stimulate our benevolence, we will leave our soldiers without service and succour when they are wounded and dying for our sakes.

Let the Red Cross rely that its good work is the best lever in raising funds; the Churches have given largely hitherto, and they, at any rate, will not be slow to give again.—Yours &c.

THE LATE CAPT. WALTER SHORT.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—The news of the death on the Marne battlefield of Capt. the Rev Walter Short, which appeared in last week's INQUIRER, brings home very vividly to us all the price which is being paid for victory in this disastrous war. We in London, no less than those who in the North of England have benefitted by his regular ministry, are deeply conscious of the loss which our denomination has sustained by his heroic self-sacrifice. Twice when he was in training in London he preached at Leytonstone, and those visits will long be cherished as a hallowed memory. He impressed us as only a preacher with a positive faith and a deeply spiritual outlook can impress his hearers. A man with a clear vision of the ideals by which he professed to be guided he was evidently actuated by his keen sense of personal duty, and his estimate of the value of the opportunity which he believed to be offered him to extend his spiritual influence as a Christian minister.

I shall never forget the feeling of admiration which he inspired in me when, walking along the railway platform of Leytonstone station, he told me why he had become a soldier. Many young fellows in his congregation had responded to their country's call, and it fell to him as minister to speak words of comfort to their families. Being a comparatively young man himself, he soon felt that the best way of proving his sincerity would be to go and share their burden. He decided to join a fighting unit because he did not wish to be screened from any of the risks to which members of his own congregation were exposed. He was looking forward to the time when, at the close of the war, he would bring his boys back to their anxious families and to their old church again.

Many will say that the minister of Bootle Church could have done far better service by staying to cheer and guide his congregation than by going to die on the battlefield; but none will withhold admiration for this example of heroism on the part of one who displayed the spirit of a true pastor, ready to make such a sacrifice in the interests of his flock.—Yours, &c.,

J. W. PETERKEN.

"MENTE SECURÂ."

HELP us, O Lord, when hopes are high,
When pleasures all around we find,
To guard against the dazzled eye
And serve Thee with a quiet mind.

Open our eyes Thy light to see
Nor live to heavenly beauty blind,
Turning our wandering eyes to Thee,
To serve Thee with a quiet mind.

When faints with fear the stricken heart,
To dark, despairing thoughts inclined,
Make us recall how good Thou art
And serve Thee with a quiet mind.

In hours of weakness or of woe,
In lonely hours be doubly kind,
Thy secret teach us more to know,
And love Thee with a quiet mind.

THE 'Life and Letters of Robert Collyer,' reviewed last week, appears not to be readily obtainable in this country. Orders had better be sent, we understand, to Messrs. Dodd, Meade & Co., New York. The price, including carriage, at present rate of exchange, will probably be 25s.

THE FUTURE OF INDIA.

"THE Report* has been received with unanimous approval by the British press." So The Nation of July 13, with enormous and unaccountable exaggeration. During the week preceding this statement, The Morning Post had been raging furiously through three leading articles, in addition to a review of Mr. Chesney's 'India under Experiment,' which was to the same effect. To common apprehension the following flowers of rhetoric hardly seem to indicate approval: "The prospect which appalled so stout a democrat as Lord Morley has no terrors for Mr. Montagu. The savour of Asiatics controlling Englishmen may possibly have been repulsive to Lord Morley; it seems to be sweet on the lips of Mr. Montagu.... The Indian Government, that is to say, the superstructure, is left to the end. Mr. Montagu is a moderate man, and is content with undermining the foundations."

The Spectator of July 13 characterises the scheme as: "A weak plan, an unwise plan, and one that has timidity written all over it.... Born in fear and cradled in credulity.... Resurrection pie (?) of Pseudo-Federalism, Parliamentarism, Bureaucracy, Jacobinism, and abstract political theorising." [Note particularly the climax.]

Another paper whose verdict, though expressed in more moderate terms, is distinctly unfavourable is The Daily Telegraph, and at the opposite extreme The Daily News is dissatisfied with the Report as not going far enough; while The Herald, under the mistaken notion that the Indian National Congress "represents every sect and party in that great country," waits to see how it is received by the members of that body, and "is not at all anxious to know what Englishmen say or think about it."

The Times is unexpectedly favourable, though with the reservation that "only very close study can show how far the principles laid down are effectively carried out in practice"; and much the same may be said of The Pall Mall Gazette. The approval of The Daily Chronicle and Manchester Guardian is whole-hearted and unqualified. An incidental remark by the last-named may usefully serve as the text for the very little that the limitations of space in THE INQUIRER will permit me to contribute to the discussion. "It is," says The Manchester Guardian, "far more democratic than the scheme of the Congress, which looks rather to the substitution of an Indian for a British electorate than to the extension of governing powers to new classes of the community."

The implied assumption, that "self-government" as meaning democracy is more important than "self-government" as meaning "government of Indians by Indians," is one which the Congress-wallahs practically repudiate, though not in express terms; and it is curious that they have with them on this point an ex-bureaucrat not often seen in their company. Sir J. D. Rees, in a letter to which the Editor of India has called attention, asks: "Were there no oligarchies in Britain?... Why jib at the oligarchy? Wait till the masses complain."

It is true that the example bequeathed to us by our forefathers is not that of striving for democracy first and for national independence afterwards, but the other way; and that down to 1832, or even 1867, the fraction of the British nation taking any part, however small, in the choice and control of their rulers was too minute to justify even the loosest use of the term democracy. It is also certain that if self-government in the sense of government of India by Indians is to be brought about in the near future, it cannot be democratic according to modern British and American standards. Here, at all events, however it may be elsewhere, the fashionable catchword, "self-determination of peoples," will not fit the facts, and the choice has to be made between government by an indigenous oligarchy on the one hand, numbering at most a tenth of the adult male population and on the other hand government, as at present, by a wholly alien community, located 6,000 miles away, and represented on the spot by a mere handful of its citizens, who do not pretend to be other than birds of passage, having their treasure and their hearts in the country from which they came, and to which they will return as soon as they have earned their pensions. The latter system has hitherto been defended on the ground that the ruling community, taken by itself, is approximately democratic, and that consequently their agents in India are restrained by training and habit, as well as by the direct orders of the Home Government, from using their autocratic powers in any other interest than that of equal justice.

The Congress party, belonging themselves to the class of prospective oligarchs, are naturally indisposed to admit that the interests of the masses will be less safe in their hands than in those of the alien bureaucracy; but the British Secretary of State and the British Viceroy, while agreeing with them as to autonomy being the ultimate aim, are no less naturally anxious to be assured, before handing over the reins, that the new government will be sufficiently broad-based to give reasonable hope of stability and progress. Hence the governing idea of the Report is political education of new electorates by actual exercise of real, though limited, responsibility, to be gradually enlarged if the experiment proves successful, until the ultimate goal is reached of "complete self-government within the Empire."

Under the Congress scheme assemblies predominantly Indian, both provincial and central, were to be immediately created, which would be able to dictate the policy to be pursued in every department of government; but the duty of carrying out the policy so dictated was to be imposed on officials still appointed and removable by the British Government, itself ultimately responsible to the British electorate. They would thus be required to serve two masters, by no means likely to be always in agreement.

Under the Scheme of the Report the principal field for that limited but real responsibility which is the essence of the new experiment is neither the purely administrative work of district and municipal boards, nor the legislative and executive functions of the supreme Government of India, but certain branches of the business, both legislative and executive, of the nine larger provinces of British India, ranging from forty-eight millions (United Provinces) to six millions (Assam). Within each province these selected departments, not necessarily the same for all, are to be entrusted to Ministers, nominated by the Governor of the Province, but dependent for the retention of their power on being able to command a majority in the Legislative Council. Of these Legislative Councils, again, a part is to be nominated, but a substantial majority is to be elected. The composition of the electorates is to be settled separately for each province by the supreme Government of India, with the sanction of the Secretary of State, after local inquiry by a Special Committee, and to be varied from time to time, with the general object of making the franchise as broad as possible. We can only gather vaguely that literacy is to be neither the sole, nor an indispensable, test of fitness to vote. Mr. Curtis, whose ideas coincide generally, though by no means invariably, with those of the Report, works out for Bengal a scheme of mixed educational and property qualification which would yield about 1½ million voters for a population of 45 millions.

* Report on Indian Constitutional Reforms. Cd. 9107. Pp. 305. Price 1s. 3d. net. Though called a Report, and presented as such to Parliament, it is in fact a joint declaration of policy by the two men immediately responsible for the Government of India, namely, the Secretary of State for India, Mr. Montagu, and the Governor-General, Lord Chelmsford.

With the transferred services would go certain powers of taxation, so that the ministers would have to satisfy their constituents that they were getting their money's worth for any expenditure incurred. Examples of services which might be transferred immediately are education, certain kinds of public works, and provision for public health, safety, and convenience; while criminal justice and police would certainly be reserved for the last stage of constitutional progress. But even within the transferred spheres of action the Executive Government retains the power of interfering to prevent mistakes which would very seriously affect the peace and safety of the community; and similar safeguards are provided throughout the whole system, whether as between the Provincial Government and the Government of India, or as between the latter and the Home Government.

Another important feature is the periodical examination of the working of all parts of the constitution, in order to determine whether all or any of the new powers can be safely enlarged, or ought on the other hand to be restricted or withdrawn. For the Provincial Governments the period is five years, and the revising authority is the Government of India. For the constitution as a whole the first regular overhauling is to take place after ten years, and is to be repeated thereafter at intervals of twelve years; the inquiry being conducted by Commissioners nominated by the Secretary of State and approved by Parliament. The authors of the Report decline to express any opinion as to the degree of approximation to complete self-government that might be reached in the first ten years even in the most advanced provinces. "We wish to attain complete responsibility where we can, and as early as we can, and we intend that its attainment should depend on the efforts of the Indian people themselves. It would not be fair to give it them till they fulfil the necessary conditions."

On the whole, so far from being "born in fear and cradled in credulity," the Report surely presents a striking combination of boldness and caution. As Mr. Curtis rightly urges (Times, July 28), the sooner a Parliamentary Committee is appointed to examine it the better.

ROLAND K. WILSON.

P.S.—Since the above was in type, the Report has been discussed (Aug. 6), and on the whole favourably received, in both Houses of Parliament.

THE FOURTH ANNIVERSARY.

PULPIT REFERENCES.

IN our churches as in others throughout the land the services on Sunday last, the Fourth Anniversary of the War, were of a deeply commemorative character, and ministers specially referred to the occasion in their sermons. The following selection illustrates the prevailing thoughts and moods:—

THE REV. F. D. PRIESTLEY EVANS (Bury): "If we made peace now, Germany would close this war with her old belief more firmly fixed than ever that war pays, and will wage war again when she is ready." After drawing attention to Prince Lichnowsky's 'Mission to London 1912-14,' and especially the gloomy picture he paints therein of Germany's future, Mr. Evans said, "we are here to remember not only the present hopefulness of our cause, but also the justness of it. We entered the war not for gain, but to preserve our possessions, not only our outward ones, valuable as those are, but our spiritual ones, our customs, institutions, which we think the most fair in the world, the right to free speech and a free press in peace times, which necessarily cannot be enjoyed to the same degree when the whole community may be endangered. And we entered it to preserve our own good name, to be true to our word, faithful to our promise to preserve our honour by our loyalty to our bond. And we remember our heroes who have given their all or risked their all for these things. And they, and their mourning friends, call us to remember that the real victory is not won, that this enormous sacrifice has not borne its rightful fruit, until we who are here have striven to our utmost, and have succeeded in making it impossible for such a calamity to fall upon the world again."

THE REV. A. W. FOX (at Newchurch): "Whatever change may have taken place in the aims with which this weary war was begun four years ago, there can be no doubt that it was first undertaken in the sacred cause of freedom, truth, and righteousness. It is imperative, now that more selfish considerations have shown their ugly presence, that this prime object of the conflict should be borne in mind. In that way alone can we help forward, be it ever so little, the coming of the Kingdom of God on earth. The first step towards this end is the establishment of a 'League of Nations,' which shall make war and to a large extent national selfishness impossible. Just as this war has arisen because professing Christians have set the 'service of tables' before the service of God, any reconstruction based on a similar materialism must fail and deserves to fail. What our own nation and the rest need most of all is a simple principle of religion, which will make it cover the whole of life and not be merely Sunday recreation. It is just this religion of the Kingdom of God taught by Jesus which needs to be the inspiring force in every human soul."

THE REV. J. H. WEATHERALL (Kensington).—Bank Holiday Sunday (says our correspondent) has usually the thinnest attendances of the year in London churches; but over a hundred people were present on Sunday morning in Essex Church, and joined earnestly and prayerfully in the service of remembrance and intercession. The hymns included 'Now pray we for our Country,' 'God Save the King,' and the 'Battle Song of the American Republic.' Mr. Weatherall was the preacher; his subject was 'The Fourth Anniversary,' and his theme was that these terrible four years had vindicated England's declaration of war and justified a good conscience and a determined hopefulness. They had proved abundantly that the aims of Germany were politically and morally reprehensible, while her methods of conducting war, her treatment of conquered territory, the bullying and braggadocio spirit of her public declarations, were all sins against a developing civilisation, and incompatible with the welfare of the world. The final demonstration of the insincerity of her plea of self-defence came when the Russian Revolution removed the only plausible basis for her apprehensions; but, unrepentantly bent on self-aggrandisement, she made no attempt to end the war when any Russian menace had ceased to exist. Our suffering and losses were unimaginably great, but they were assuredly less than would have come upon the world if we had left Belgium and France to the tender mercies of a Germany swollen with vanity and drunk with success. One great good of these four years was that the Western world had been converted from a sentimental approval of international peace into a burning passion for its permanent and speedy realisation. This had solidified itself in the concrete scheme for a League of Nations, which has secured now so many defenders that we are justified in the faith that we are in view of the end of militarism and all its dark and disastrous corruptions and destructions.

THE REV. F. K. FREESTON (Hampstead): "This day stands equally for a great memory and a great duty. It is a day of affliction—and of fresh resolution; of tender sorrow for those who have fallen, but of unshaken determination that they shall not have died in vain. One of our own ministers has fallen at the front in the recent fight. We salute his bravery; we honour his memory. The nation is still unshaken and stern. Soldier and civilian alike, whether in victory or defeat, are convinced before high heaven that we are battling, not for aggression, not for domination, but in defence of sacred principles the maintenance of which is essential to the civilisation of the world. The war has taught all of us that nothing less than our uttermost will suffice for the great duties and opportunities that lie before us. A new chivalry summons us to the redressing of evils and the righting of social wrongs which we have feared to force into the open and have tolerated far too long. Self-devotion and urgency have come to stay. 'Men who once seemed absorbed in their own petty concerns have "ridden off into the unknown,"' writes a chaplain, 'with a great glory which none can take away, and a heroism which seemed forsooth to have vanished from the earth has looked at us again out of quiet shining English eyes, splendidly unconscious of anything else but to venture all and promptly at the call of duty.' The war has flung us all upon the essential, the eternal, the invisible; it has already made us more religious in the things that matter most. Outwardly it is the greatest disaster that could possibly be, the direst tragedy of all history, the uttermost test of our Christianity. Christianity will indeed have failed utterly if it does not prevent the recurrence of any such world catastrophe, if it does not 'make the world safe for democracy.' But the war has burnt into us already that a League of Nations must exist and all war cease. Then out of the greatest disaster and cataclysm the nations have ever seen may come the greatest step in human progress the world has ever known."

THE REV. H. J. ROSSINGTON (Belfast): We meet at the close of the fourth year of the greatest war in history. All its varied events need not concern us, since the past year contains suggestions enough and is rich with the promise of progress recently achieved. The beginning of the fourth year was characterised by grave dangers from which by the mercy of God we have been delivered. The immaterial advances are even more marked. The moral of our forces, naval and military, was never higher. Mistakes have been made by those in command, but the valour and endurance of our men have served us splendidly in times of crisis. Greater unity of command has been secured so that now the allied forces act in concert and with more concentrated aim and purpose. This makes for moral as well as for military success, since British and Americans perceive and partake of the fervent hope which inspires the French and Belgians in their whole-hearted effort to regain their countries from the invader. But cannot we apply the apostle's conviction—"that he will also still deliver us"—to the case of those who during the past year have paid the supreme sacrifice? Certainly, the immortal hope never was more steadfast and assured than in the hearts of some who have freely died that liberty for mankind might live. Just as Donald Hankey testified to his conviction that 'the beloved Captain' still lives, though to his men he seemed to die, even so we may feel of those we have loved and seemed to lose. Just because we believe that the principles of truth and justice and righteousness can never die, so must we remain convinced that those who rallied to their aid and sought to establish their increasing reign must truly live too."

LIEUT.-COL. BULLOCK (Leeds): To-day, after four years of war, Germany had lost nothing save what she had gained in the previous course of the war, and, save for the damage done by bombs dropped by allied airmen on German soil, Germany, having doubled the amount of territory and population under her control, had vastly increased her resources, and was thus far better off to-day than when she entered the war; and, if some people could have the things they prated about, she would have the victory. The war was costing so much, so much was involved, that he refused to entertain for a single moment the suggestion of peace. He could count up what it had cost, and what it would cost, in human lives, but the things worth having were always costly. England could have had peace on the second day of the war if she had wanted it. France could have had peace on any day of the four years that the knife had been at her throat. Belgium could have had peace, but it would have been a peace of dishonour, for France a peace of subjugation, and for England a peace not worth gaining. If big nations were to be allowed to overrun little nations with impunity, Germany's action in regard to Belgium would be repeated. But the rights of the little peoples as of the big ones must be respected. England could have had peace by repudiating the terms of the treaty which she had signed, but such a peace would have been the violation of righteousness. When Germany swore by the blood of her sons that she recognised the rights of others, and would never again plunge the world into war, it would be time to make peace. His own land would never make peace until her troops stood on German soil, and he believed the same was true of England. It was only by making terms on German soil that they could secure lasting peace. He did not ask them to hate Germany. He would as soon be subdued by the physical force of Germany as be overcome by her spirit.

THE LATE REV. WALTER SHORT, B.A. MEMORIAL SERVICE.

On Sunday morning last a largely attended service was held at Bootle Free Church, Liverpool, in memory of the minister of the church, who, as Captain, 5th Battalion, K.O.Y.L.I., fell in action in France, July 20, 1918. Representatives from all the local congregations were present, and the service, which was conducted by the Rev. J. Collins Odgers, B.A., was most impressive. The Rev. John Ellis gave the address, in the course of which he said:—

THIS "Day of Remembrance" comes home to us who are assembled here with special poignancy, for we are conscious that one who was very near and dear to us, who has "fought the good fight," has now finished "the earthly course." We believe that henceforth he wears "the crown of righteousness." When the fateful telegram with its brief but solemn message—"Capt W. Short killed in action July 20"—was made known the intimation filled the hearts of a great multitude of those who had counted it an honour to call him friend, in the town from which I come, as well as here, with inexpressible sadness, and a great flood of sympathy flows out to her on whom falls the heavy burden of grief, to help to bear her up in this time of sad bereavement. The telegram was followed by a letter from his Colonel describing the manner of his death, in which he says: "He was killed by a machine gunner when at the head of his company, which he was gallantly leading against the Germans at the time. Capt. Short will be greatly missed by the Battalion and especially by his company, who loved him and would do anything for him. His death is a great loss to me, not only as a company commander, although he was one of the best officers I had, and could always be relied upon, but as a personal friend, and I shall miss him very much indeed. He was a very brave and good soldier and a gentleman, always cheery and a good companion. On behalf of the whole Battalion, will you please accept our deepest sympathy in your great loss, which I am sure will be lessened (perhaps) by the knowledge that he died, as he once expressed it, 'a glorious death in the service of God and country.' Will you also express my sympathy with the members of his Church, to whom he was minister before he joined the army. I had several interesting talks to him about them."

So his C.O. found him at the end when he was called upon to face perilous duties and to confront the supreme test. But we who have known him longer can see now how his whole career was a preparation for high and noble enterprise.

It was my privilege to see him in the days of his youth, and to watch his traits unfolding in the years of his manhood. It was not without a struggle that he set himself free from the traditions of Methodism in which he had been reared, to come into what he found to be the larger liberties of our Unitarian faith. But when convinced of the truth he was bold to make the leap. It was great gain to the Upper Chapel, Sheffield, when he joined, for no one among its young men was more devoted to the service of the church and its institutions than he. He was glad to take his share in missionary work in those early days, and frequently he would go out to the smaller chapels in isolated positions in Yorkshire and Derbyshire to give of his best as a lay preacher. It was whilst engaged in such work that the call came to him to give his life to the ministry of religion. He must now, in response to the call, leave the office, in which he had a promising career, for the study, College, and University.

The preparation for the ministry meant for him hard and persistent effort. His qualities of conscientiousness and loyalty gave him lofty ideals. Heart and mind must be as completely trained and equipped as possible for the high work to which he had dedicated himself. He passed through College and University bearing sheaves of honours and distinction. It was my privilege to succeed him as minister at Stalybridge where during three years he had abundantly proved his worth in his first charge. I found that he had preached the gospel out of a cultured and well-stored mind and heart, with sincerity and power. More than that, he had lived the gospel as a faithful pastor and friend, at all times ready with sympathy and help. He was fond of the children, and kindly to the poor and neglected. He brought his tremendous energy and business acumen to bear on the organisations and institutions of the church, and left them in a state of splendid efficiency. It was with real regret when the time came that they said goodbye on his accepting the call to Bootle, and love and goodwill of a great company accompanied him.

It was a real call to the ministry of this church (Bootle). He told me he regarded it not only as a call but a "challenge." In leaving a comparatively small industrial town for a great city, with its many interests and problems, with strong men at the head of churches and philanthropic organisations, he felt there was for him a mighty challenge to be and do his best.

When the war broke out, and times of strain and stress and sorrow followed, you looked to him as leader and friend. He never failed you. There was a time when out of consideration for you it was difficult for him to decide how to act. He reached the conclusion that, since war was actual, and that it was a necessity for the country to enter on it, and the cause of the Allies was right, he ought not himself to shirk the responsibility of defending England, having urged this duty upon others.

You did not lose your minister when you set him free to join the army. You were with him in the training camp, in the bivouac, on the battle-field. In your monthly Calendar, by letters, and when on leave-visits, he showed a wonderful concern for his people. From within the maelstrom he often sent messages of comfort and cheer. These 'Pictures from France' will be a precious memorial. They come out of the heart of one who never forsook his ministry. He was a soldier of grim necessity, but all the time, and especially as he became familiar with the horrors of it, he was filled with a deep-seated abhorrence of war. He never lost faith. In the midst of the ruins of a French homestead, he wrote: "And so, under a blue sky in which the lark soars and sings, and with a few spring flowers in my hand, I will believe in the tender mercies of our God, notwithstanding the cruel barking of guns on my right, and the abomination of desolation that stalks through the villages." And amongst the last words he wrote were these: "Religion and war are strange bed-fellows, but that soldier who has chivalry and idealism, achieves peace even in conflict, and enjoys the fruit of a good conscience, and the blessing of the most High." Such faith amid such circumstances should shame our petty complaints.

His important duties as adjutant were discharged with promptness and alacrity. The business of the battalion passed through his hands, and he had many opportunities of doing kindly acts which made for the comfort of the men. Many indications were observable that they not only obeyed his commands as an officer, but that they responded out of love for him as a man. There was no need for him, as adjutant, to leave headquarters, but on the night of my stay near the line, on the report of an enemy raid, he, with the Major and the Chaplain and the Doctor, sprang out into the dark night, with machine gun bullets hurtling around, to succour men at their posts and direct operations.

In very truth, Donald Hankey has painted a perfect picture of our friend in 'The Beloved Captain.'

THE CHURCH OF ALL NATIONS.

LAST month we noted the opening (in May) of this memorable addition to the churches of Boston. Our friend the Rev. T. Van Ness has sent us some further particulars. He recalls to mind the foundation of the "Second Church" in Boston, 1649, to commemorate the setting up of the Puritan Commonwealth in England. The front of the old building used by the congregation then formed has been erected, "stone for stone," as the front of the new (and much larger) church. The old "Second Church," being for sale in 1868, when Dr. J. Freeman Clarke removed with his people to establish the "Church of the Disciples," so lovingly described by Oliver Wendell Holmes, the question was "Who would buy it?"

"An influential Methodist, Gov. Claflin, suggested to Henry Morgan that he buy the Chapel. 'Bid as high as $22,000,' he said, 'and I will stand back of you.' Morgan did so, and the building was 'knocked down' to him. 'I will give you $50 and a marble slab,' said one enthusiastic friend, after the purchase, "on condition that you inscribe on the slab the words 'Morgan Chapel.'" Thus did Morgan Chapel (the former name of Morgan Memorial) come into being, and here in Morgan Chapel, Henry Morgan did some of his best work. Mr. Morgan, it should be said, was an independent Methodist Episcopal minister, whose great ambition was to preach to the poor and the neglected. His special foe was rum. In season and out of season the reverend evangelist preached against drink and the traffic in it. At his death it was found that he had bequeathed the property on Indiana Place to the Benevolent Fraternity (the Unitarian churches of Boston organised for philanthropic purposes) with the proviso that at the head of Morgan Chapel there should always be a regular Methodist minister.

"The Unitarians accepted the trust and for ten years, 1884-94, in no way changed the general evangelical character of the work done at the Chapel. Ministers came and went. In 1895 the New England Conference of Methodists appointed the present head of the Church of All Nations, Rev. Edgar J. Helms, to be in charge of Morgan Chapel, and from that year a new era of administration and policy began. At this time, the head of the Benevolent Fraternity was the former minister, the Rev. Edward A. Horton, of the Second Church in Boston, while the minister, the Rev. Thomas Van Ness, was a director. Afterward he became president. It thus came about that the spirit of the Second Church found itself in harmony with the independent spirit of Henry Morgan. As a matter of course, the practical work for which the Fraternity was established was emphasised more and more. Gradually, the activities of Morgan Chapel were harmonised with those of the other Fraternity missions. As Mr. Helms's energy became a strong factor, these activities expanded, took new and untried directions, until at last not all the Fraternity directors were in accord with what was being done, and suggested, because of the expense involved, that the Methodists be called in and invited to co-operate in management and as well to share in the financial burden."

Mr. Van Ness and Mr. Helms cordially worked together in developing "Morgan Chapel" into the "Morgan Memorial," an institutional church working on a large scale and in the broadest social and religious spirit. Owing to the influx of people of many races into the neighbourhood—Syrians, Italians, Jews, Greeks, Portuguese, Japanese, Negroes, and others—the "All Nations" idea arose, and the new building costing some £40,000, "will be a monument to the Catholic spirit and open-handed co-operation of the Unitarian faith, for it is the faith which makes the beliefs and the practices and the fellowship of religion simple and single for all people." The main auditorium seats 800 people.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Birmingham: Church of the Messiah.—At the Meeting of the Vestry Committee held on June 21, it was unanimously resolved: "That the Vestry Committee having fully discussed the Rev. Lawrence Clare's letter as to his position under the National Service Acts, considers he is doing more useful work by continuing in his present position than by joining the army; but it will be glad to give him every facility for taking up suitable work in connection with the Y.M.C.A. abroad if any such opportunity occurs."

Bradford.—The Rev. Thomas Paxton, who is leaving Bradford for Scarborough, has been the recipient of gifts from the officials and friends of the Khaki Club, for which he has done such admirable work as one of its honorary secretaries, from the Bradford Branch of the National Commercial Temperance League, of which he has been a member for the past seven years, and from the members of Chapel Lane Chapel and Sunday School. The presentation from the Khaki Club was made by the Chairman of the Bradford Chamber of Commerce at a large gathering presided over by the Lord Mayor, Councillor H. H. Tetley, who was accompanied by the Lady Mayoress, and the warmest appreciation was expressed of Mr. Paxton's services. The presentation consisted of an illuminated address in book form, together with a purse containing over £203 from the officials and friends of the Club. A framed photograph was also presented on behalf of the soldiers and sailors by Corporal A. Downs. In his reply Mr. Paxton said the work he had tried to do for the Club had been the greatest pleasure of his life, and no one was more sorry than he that the condition of his health had rendered it necessary that he should give it up. He threw himself, we may add, whole-heartedly into the organisation of the Khaki Club four years ago, and became largely instrumental in making it the centre where all soldiers and sailors, on their arrival in the city, were met and supplied with refreshments, as well as afterwards conveyed in motors to their own homes. He always endeavoured to meet the trains at any hour of the day or night and personally extend an invitation and a welcome to the Club. Frequently, too, he would arrange motor rides for the soldiers and sailors into the country.

Bury: Bank Street.—The 4th Bury (Bank Street) Girl Guides Company had an Open Night on July 9, which proved a great success, this being the first public effort since the formation of the company. Mrs. S. Smethurst took the chair.—It is announced in the Calendar that Sam Bridge, R.F.A., was killed in action on May 28, at the age of 26.

Chesham, Bury.—The death is announced in the Calendar of Joe Elliott, who was struck by a piece of shell while on patrol duty in France on July 7 and killed instantly. He entered the army in a brave and fearless spirit, and his officer speaks very highly of his devotion to duty.

Dundee.—The Rev. Richard Lee, formerly of Chesham, has accepted the leadership of the Free Religious Movement at Dundee, and commenced his duties there on August 4.

Framlingham and Bedford.—The members of the Suffolk Village Mission, who have an outing together every summer, spent an enjoyable day on July 22 at Aldeburgh.

Gee Cross.—The final stage in the celebration of the jubilee of the Rev. H. E. Dowson as minister of Hyde Chapel was reached on Saturday, July 27, when a new east window was unveiled in the presence of a large congregation. A short and impressive service was conducted by the Rev. F. Heming Vaughan. Among those present were the Rev. H. E. and Mrs. Dowson, Miss Margaret Ashton, Miss Ethel Dowson, Miss Margaret Dowson, Captain and Mrs. Reekie, Mrs. Worthington, and Mrs. Kessler. Lord Ashton was unavoidably absent. Mr. A. Barlow, chairman of the Jubilee Celebration Committee, said the work had been decided upon with the consultation and approval of Mr. Dowson. It was proposed to place a record in suitable stone by side of the window, which would give details for all future generations to read, and they hoped to get a description of the window, approved by the artist, explaining its meaning. Miss Ashton unveiled the window, and presented it to Mr. Dowson on behalf of the congregation, and in the course of a speech full of warm appreciation of the work which he and Mrs. Dowson had done for the congregation—of which she herself was one of the oldest members—said:—"We feel it is a trifling thing we can do for you. It may seem like giving ourselves an additional present, but it comes from our hearts, we know that you will cherish it in the years to come as a symbol of our love and admiration for you, and we know you will receive it in that spirit from us." The Rev. F. H. Vaughan then offered the dedicatory prayer. Mr. Dowson acknowledged the presentation with much emotion, and in a characteristic speech expressed his warm attachment to Hyde Chapel and its congregation, and his deep sense of the privilege that had been given to him as their minister for so many happy years. He concluded with these words:—"I rejoice that no doctrine in theology is the distinguishing mark of our window. It is something far more, it breathes the Christianity shared by all Christians alike in the larger church to which, thank God, we all belong. Jesus is no better and no worse whatever theological explanation be given to His matchless divine personality. In this chapel we follow Him, and we love Him and bear His sacred name, because to us He is the life with God to which we have set our faces, and with no meaner prayer than that we may grow up in the likeness of His spirit."

Glossop.—The Free Churches of Glossop held a United Intercession Service on Remembrance Day in the Unitarian Church at 8 P.M., conducted by the Rev. Joseph Wilson. The War Liturgy drawn up by the National Conference and the British and Foreign Unitarian Association was used, and the service was choral. The congregation which crowded the building represented all the Free Churches of the town and included a few Anglicans. Miss Lily Almond sang a solo. The following ministers took part in the proceedings: the Revs. W. G. Goodwin and J. Brierley, Congregationalists; the Rev. E. Dennis, Wesleyan Reform; the Rev. W. H. Hunter, Primitive Methodist; and the Rev. H. Cullen, Wesleyan.

Horwich.—The Unitarian Church has suffered a sad loss in the death of Mrs. W. B. Burgess, the wife of the Church Secretary, which was sudden and quite unexpected. Mrs. Burgess, who was only 32, was held in the highest respect, and much sympathy is felt for her husband. A memorial service was conducted by the minister, the Rev. H. B. Hannah, on Sunday evening, July 28, when there was a crowded attendance.—On Sunday evening, August 4, a Flower Service was conducted by Mr. Hannah, the first held for many years. There was a great array of choice flowers which were afterwards sent to the military hospital. The outlook for this church, which has had a long struggle, is brightening, and headway is being made in every direction. Fifteen new members have joined during the last six months.

Kendal.—The Sunday School Anniversary and Flower Festival was celebrated on Sunday and Monday, July 21 and 22. The primary class sang at both services on the Sunday, when the Rev. C. E. Mercer preached morning and evening, and on Monday a cantata was rendered by the school.

Liverpool: Hope Street.—The evening services during August will be similar in character to those of last year, namely, simple services of Christian faith, worship, and meditation. On Sunday, September 8, the first of a series of four special evening addresses on 'Christianity and International Reconstruction' will be given. The subjects of these addresses are as follows: September 8, 'The Lordship of Christ and the Unity of Nations'; September 15, 'The Christian Moral Basis of a League of Nations'; September 22, 'The International of Christ and the International of Labour'; September 29, 'The Necessary Christian Regeneration of Heart.'—At a meeting of the Hope Street congregation specially called for the purpose after morning worship on July 28, a resolution of affectionate respect and admiration for Capt. the Rev. Walter Short, and sympathy for Mrs. Short was passed. Mr. Short's death is a great loss to liberal religion in the Liverpool district.

Liverpool: Ullet Road.—In the absence, through indisposition, of the Rev. C. M. Wright, a short devotional service was held on Sunday evening by Mr. R. Durning Holt, M.P., President of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association.

London: Blackfriars Mission.—A successful Flower Show was held on Thursday, August 1, at Stamford Street Chapel, when plants grown by the Sunday scholars, their parents, and others were exhibited. The chair was taken by Mr. A. A. Tayler, and Miss Grace Mitchell, who acted as Judge, gave an address. Mrs. Stephenson distributed the prizes.—On August 4, the fourth anniversary of the war, the evening service was of a special character, and the occasion formed the subject of Mr. Stephenson's discourse. There are fifty-one men on the Roll of Honour of the Mission, three of whom have died.

London: Essex Church.—On Monday evening, by the invitation of the Manager, the Rev. J. H. Weatherall gave a brief address to the audience at the Coronet Theatre, and read to them Mr. Lloyd George's Message to the Nation.

Mansfield.—The Rev. T. P. Spedding, Missionary Agent of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, has received and accepted a cordial invitation to the pastorate of this congregation, and will enter on his new duties on October 6.—News has been received (at Essex Hall) from Private Cecil Larratt, 2nd Sherwood Foresters, who is a prisoner of war at Frankfort-on-Oder. He is in good health.

Padiham.—The Rev. J. H. Ewbank, of Swinton, has accepted an invitation to Nazareth Unitarian Chapel, and will begin his ministry there in November.

Poole.—The Sunday School Anniversary took place on Sunday, July 27. In the evening a special form of service, prepared by the minister (the Rev. G. B. Stallworthy), much of it his own composition, in which the scholars took the leading part, was held, and was of a highly instructive and devotional character. The collection was for the summer outing, which took place on Wednesday, August 1, when a party of nearly one hundred marched to Branksome Chine, and a most happy time was spent on the sands. The Rev. G. B. and Mrs. Stallworthy, Mr. W. E. Stephens (Superintendent), Mrs. Stephens, and Mrs. Dean accompanied the party.

Pudsey.—An open-air sacred concert was given in Pudsey Park on Sunday evening, July 28, by the Pudsey Unitarian Church choir, largely augmented for the occasion. Mr. Joseph A. Webster was the conductor and Mr. Arthur Webster the pianist. The programme included popular hymns, one being Mr. Wm. Muff's 'Response,' anthems, and choruses. As the Mayor was away from home, his place as chairman was taken by Alderman C. H. Haley, Deputy Mayor, who complimented conductor and members of band and chorus on the excellent services they had rendered. There was a large attendance of the public, and a collection and other receipts resulted in £45 being raised for the benefit of local wounded soldiers and sailors.

Rochdale.—There are 127 names on the Unitarian Church Roll of Honour, of whom 13 have been killed in action or have died of wounds, and 2 have died from other causes.

Stalybridge.—A Memorial Service for the late Capt. Walter Short, minister of the Bootle Free Church, was held at the Unitarian Church last Sunday evening.—Arrangements have now been made to set the Rev. John Ellis free for service with the Y.M.C.A. for the duration of the war, and he expects to return to France about the middle of September. The Rev. N. McLachlan will act as locum tenens for the ensuing year.

Wareham.—The Sunday School Anniversary Service was held in the evening of last Sunday, August 4. Special hymns were sung by the scholars and congregation and an anthem by the choir. Solo parts were taken by Miss Dean, Miss Hodge, and Miss Tubbs. There was a good congregation present although there was a "United" Remembrance Service held on the Walls, to which our congregation was not invited!). The service was conducted by the Rev. G. B. Stallworthy of Poole, who gave a most helpful address bearing on the School Anniversary and the fourth anniversary of the war. The collection was for the scholars' outing to Swanage, fixed for next Wednesday. The front of the church has been cleaned and painted and trees planted at the foot of the steps; the denominational name has been painted in large letters over the front—"Free Christian Church (Unitarian)"—giving the place an appearance of life and activity. Any preachers or speakers or other Church workers coming south for holiday will be welcomed here, and if they write to Mr. W. E. Stephens, Hon. Lay Minister, St. Ladoed, Wimborne Road, Poole, he will be pleased to arrange for special bills.

OUT OF THE HEART OF THE STORM.

Twelve Sermons preached at Rosslyn Hill Chapel Hampstead, and Manchester College, Oxford.

BY

Rev. HENRY GOW, B.A.

The sermons are written by one who believes with President Wilson that "right is more precious than peace," and that no personal sorrow or loss should discourage us and turn us from our firm resolve to overthrow the Prussian autocracy. They are written too in the growing confidence that faith in God and in the supremacy of Love has become more and not less possible and real through the conflict and agony of recent times.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

All letters and manuscripts for the Editor should be sent to 13 Bream's Buildings, Fetter Lane, London, E.C.4. They must reach the Editor not later than Wednesday morning for publication the same week.

DR. JACKS is contributing a noteworthy series of articles to The Star in elucidation of a plan for founding the League of Nations on a basis of Mutual Insurance against economic collapse under the enormous debts which all the belligerents will have to bear. He tells us that he got the idea from a book by the late Prof. Royce, of Harvard, on 'Insurance and the War' (Macmillan, 1916), in which international provision is proposed to cope with natural calamities—famines, earthquakes, etc.—in the first instance, but with a view to closer interdependence and intercourse generally. He adds that in correspondence Dr. Royce, before his death, referred to the problem of national indebtedness, and would no doubt agree with the extension of his scheme so as to meet this greatest of calamities. As set forth by Dr. Jacks there would be an incorporation of Mutual Insurance formed by the belligerents, with such neutrals as might wish to join; a common Fund should be created, to begin with, by conversion of a fixed proportion of National Debts, transfer of colonial possession (especially those most likely to be subjects of future dispute), and by appropriation of any indemnity imposed to international uses. Each State would then take out a Policy, insuring wholly or in part, the payment on its National Debt, and pay a premium actuarially fixed. We commend the articles to the study of thoughtful persons. They appeared on Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday this week, and re-commence next Monday.

IN a letter written just before the battle began which drove the Germans from the Marne and long weeks before the victorious attack east of Amiens, Dr. S. A. Eliot of Boston said: "Just now I think I am right in saying that there is a distinct feeling of confidence on this side of the sea. There is a general impression that the German wave has reached its high tide and that the next six months will see its backward flow. That may be part of the sanguine American temperament, and yet it seems based on some pretty reliable facts. I have not myself been one of the believers in any rapid ending of the struggle. It has seemed to me that it was likely to be fearfully prolonged; but to-day, at any rate, I am in a more optimistic mood, and find myself inclined to take up again seriously the possibilities of reviving our relationships with the free churches of the free nations." Our friend goes on to speak of his dream that in 1920 there may be an international gathering over there to celebrate the tercentenary of the Pilgrim Fathers at Plymouth, and that in 1925—the birth-year of both the American Unitarian Association and the British and Foreign Unitarian Association—there may be one in London. Well, it is not bad to "dream" now and then. Meanwhile, we are "getting on with the war."

Now that there is enough sunshine to go round we commend to seekers for health that prescription of Walt Whitman's to "loaf, and invite your soul." Most of us are too busy as a rule, or think we are, to open ourselves to the great healing tides that flow around us; but in these glorious summer days, to the light of which the news of victory adds hope and cheer, if chastened, there should be a chance for us to do better, to drink in vigour of mind and body, and get readier for the next stage of the journey, the next spell of service. The example of Whitman in his camp work in the Civil War is worth noting. He told a correspondent how he succeeded so well in nursing and comforting the wounded. It was more by keeping himself at the top of physical fitness than by giving physic, tit-bits, money, or anything that money can buy. He fortified himself for each tour by previous rest, "bath, clean clothes, a good meal, and as cheerful an appearance as possible." A good hint, this, to religious teachers especially.

WE call attention elsewhere to 'The League of Nations.' The Bishop of Oxford, Dr. Gore, speaks of it as 'The Opportunity of the Church.' He says, in a pamphlet with this title, "The world's despair is the Church's hope." The proposed League "will rest, confessedly, on no religious sanction such as the Middle Ages would have provided or professed to provide. Nevertheless, it will rest upon the idea of a fellowship of humanity, supreme in its interests over all separate national claims, a fellowship based on justice and the rights of weaker as well as stronger nations—an idea which has mainly had its origin in Christian thought or imagination, and which is the product of a civilisation at least deeply leavened by Christianity and to which the name of Christ is still the name above every name. Let the Church of Christ, then," adds the Bishop, "marshal all its divided forces to welcome and keep to the front in the attention of mankind this League of Nations, based on the recognition of the fellowship of nations, and force it into practical realisation."

THE Rev. Clay MacCauley, who has worked in the Unitarian cause in Japan for nearly thirty years, was the recipient of a remarkable manifestation of esteem on the attainment of his 75th birthday in May. A banquet given at Tokyo in his honour was attended by a hundred and fifty persons prominent in literary, political, social, and religious circles, including University professors, nobles, and clerical and lay representatives of Episcopal, Congregational, Methodist, Baptist, Roman Catholic, Universalist, and other Christian bodies, beside his Unitarian friends. There were also present Shinto, Buddhist, and Confucian representatives. Cordial letters were received from the Anglican Bishop and the head of the Orthodox missions; and the Emperor himself sent Dr. MacCauley the decoration of "The Sacred Treasure (third class)," an honour rarely bestowed on foreigners not of official rank. The newspapers gave large space to the event, and wrote in terms of warm appreciation of Dr. MacCauley's long service in uplifting the life of the whole community.

THE Report of two doctors to the United States Government on the conditions affecting the health and morals of American troops in Europe has been represented in our newspapers this week by a striking diagram dealing with the drink question as modified by recent control. The old observation that people cannot be made sober by Act of Parliament will be henceforth sillier than ever, in the light of the figures now published. The great fall in the number of convictions for drunkenness, to less than a fifth in 1918 (six months) compared with 1913, may be partly due to laxity; but the statistics of alcoholic disease would appear to show beyond a doubt that the evil has been greatly reduced. Thus, in a given area, the cases of delirium tremens last year fell to about a fifth of the number four years ago, deaths from alcoholism to less than a third for the country as a whole, and from cirrhosis of the liver to little more than a half. The figures for attempted suicide and suffocation of infants show a corresponding reduction. Things are quite bad enough as they are, but restricted facilities are clearly a powerful means to improvement, and the nation will be foolish indeed if it does not insist on their continuance and stiffening.

ANOTHER side of the question of soldiers' health, that relating to sexual diseases, is not included in the sections published from this Report. We wish we could receive equal assurance of improvement in this direction, but the evidence available is in fact most disquieting—and disgraceful. In its way the notorious Regulation 40 D, which gives power to inflict compulsory examination on women accused of communicating disease, is eloquent of the alarm of the army doctors. In the course of a case before a London magistrate this week the prosecuting lawyer declared that young soldiers by the hundred were being incapacitated in this vile way, and urged the necessity of the utmost rigour in carrying out the Regulation. Whether this method of protecting men from the results of vice will prove as useful as the promoters hope is at least doubtful; but common sense would insist that if one sex is treated as dangerous in the communication of disease the other should be so. The numerous protests being made against the ill-treatment of women, often apparently on trumped up accusation, show that some sense of fairness, not to say of decency, yet remains in our regulation-ridden times.

AMONG American Unitarian ministers who have visited Essex Hall this week, we had the pleasure of welcoming the Rev. A. H. Coar of Holyoke, Mass., where he has been minister for the past eleven years. He is at present engaged at the American Army Officers' Inn in Cavendish Square, London. The Rev. G. A. Mark of All Souls Unitarian Church, Dorchester, Mass., who is announced to preach at Acton, on Sunday next, and at Stamford Street on the following Sunday, is engaged in American Y.M.C.A. work at Russell Square. Mr. Mark, on his arrival in London, stayed a few nights at Lawrence House. Both were interested in the American Room at Essex Hall, and at seeing the portrait of Dr. Charles W. Eliot decked with the Stars and Stripes of the United States.

THE PROBLEM OF THE LEAGUE.

WHEN Mr. Balfour told an attentive House of Commons the other day that he was not only a supporter of the proposed "League of Nations" but a "vehement" supporter some people were a little surprised. But Mr. Balfour has been to America; he has met there and conversed with President Wilson and the men of high ability and equal sense who are upholding their great leader's standard; and he is himself—a man whose politics have sometimes puzzled his friends and whose temperament has sometimes betrayed him into a half-indolent, half-cynical aloofness from the violent eagerness of narrower and less cultivated minds, but also a man who has not reached three score years and ten without searchings of heart as to the meaning of life. Lesser men, in whom broad human sympathies are dulled by self-seeking or subordinated to sectional interests may easily wonder at the vehemence of our Foreign Secretary. The proposed League is to them little more than just one counter the more with which statesmen and diplomatists play their game. Some public men in this country have received the idea with marked coolness, others with expressions of contempt. Apparently, though our impression may be wrong, there is less liking for it in France than here; how the Italians and others regard it we are even less able to judge. Count Reventlow, whose patriotic ardour at least is beyond question, hotly denounces it. The acceptance of it by Germany, he says, would signify defeat. The record may be borne in mind when our own ardent spirits declare it little better than a betrayal of our country.

Fortunately, a large number of the ablest men at home share Mr. Balfour's energetic devotion to the cause. If in the United States the proportion of its adherents, at any rate avowed, seems larger than here, that is what might be expected in a land where vast multitudes of men have grown up in an atmosphere of democratic ideals. Yet even there the responsible leaders feel the need of creating a massive popular feeling on the subject. They are planning an education campaign by which to bring the idea and meaning of the League home to the average citizen. If such a campaign is needed over there it certainly is on this side, where use and wont have a power far beyond that exercised in the young Republic of the West, and where the spectre of militarism is so threateningly close that men are apt to be infected with the panic fears that rob them of self-mastery and obscure the far seen vision of a sanely constructed world. And if the people are to be educated at all wisely they need much more than a vague appeal to their emotions. God knows there should be no need of rousing these. The agonies we have suffered and must still endure, the unspeakable horrors that have haunted us day by day, our piteous bereavements and shattered hopes, and the knowledge we have that so many other nations on earth have shared this hell with us, should make unnecessary any reminder of what this war means, and what every war henceforth must mean. We are told—and who can doubt it—that as the present war exceeds all previous wars in disaster to the human race so must any future struggle of the kind exceed the catastrophe of this. Viscount Grey of Falloden, whose reputation has been so splendidly cleared for Germans by their own Ambassador to this country, may well bid the people of every land "Learn or Perish!"

The phrase, as many of our readers know, occurs in the closing sentences of a pamphlet entitled 'The League of Nations' recently issued by Lord Grey, extensive quotations from which have appeared in the newspapers. We earnestly beg serious-minded persons—there should be no others in these times, but, alas! there are, even now—we urge with the utmost vehemence on our own part that serious-minded persons will not content themselves with having merely glanced at such quotations as if they had but an ephemeral significance. The whole pamphlet is but a short one, it is published (by the Oxford University Press) at threepence. It is the first of a series which ought to be read and pondered far and wide. Especially they should read and ponder this literature who are responsible in any degree as teachers and leaders of opinion. And most especially, as it seems to us, those ministers who for any reason have not gone to the war are bound in honour to give their whole heart and soul and strength to this home campaign. It is little enough in comparison with the sacrifice made by those who have gone, and yet the demand is for no mean or perfunctory service here.

For, as we have said, mere emotion, however exalted, is not enough for the purpose—a purpose big with the destinies of mankind and therefore needing the most careful consideration of all the factors of the problem, and a strenuous application of soundest and shrewdest wisdom. The titles of the various pamphlets alluded to indicate some of the knotty points involved, and we shall only deceive ourselves and betray posterity if we gloss over the difficulties in a gush of enthusiasm. No such fault can be brought against the writers, whose names will be recognised as those of men not only eminent in intellect but of undoubted candour. Thus far the series includes, in addition to Viscount Grey's, 'The League of Nations and the Coming Rule of Law,' by Sir Frederick Pollock; 'The League of Nations and the Democratic Idea,' by Prof. Gilbert Murray; 'The League of Nations in History,' by Prof. A. F. Pollard; 'The League of Nations and Freedom of the Seas,' by Sir Julian Corbett; and two others, respectively by Mr. Arthur Henderson and Sir Sydney Olivier, deal with the relation of the League to 'Labour' and to 'Primitive Peoples.'

We have been told, through Parliament, that the Allies are "carefully considering" the whole subject. Second to getting the war well won there is nothing they could better do, for no winning will be well unless it leads to such a constructive settlement as shall safeguard the future. But it is one thing for statesmen and diplomatists to consider and to arrange among themselves, quite another for nations to be imbued with wise principles and fortified by instructed judgment. And nowadays it is the nation that wars, not a separable military machine, and if there is to be peace on earth the nations at large must make it. The need is imperative, therefore, of a widespread effort, in all civilised lands, to get this thing understood, its implications clearly seen and sincerely accepted, and the required force of will generated to carry it past all obstacles—of passion or self-interest among the rest—into triumphant establishment as a permanent human institution. It will cost some sacrifice of deep-rooted sentiment, still more surrender of selfish aims, and it will tax to the fullest extent the mental and moral capacity of mankind to grapple with fate. But all the price thus indicated—and, dare we believe, all the price paid in these awful years—will find an equivalent boon in a new era for our race. Let us believe it, not faint-heartedly, but as those who have inherited the conviction that the life of all men is subject to a Divine Purpose, and whose daily prayer is that the Divine Kingdom may come. If the intelligent zeal of good people were but equal to their devoutness of aspiration the Kingdom would be brought much nearer than it seems to be. Once more we say to all our friends—read, study, master this subject, if not in more extended works at least in this series of short but instructive essays. Help our people to “Learn” and not to “Perish.”

THINK ABOUT EDUCATION

Now that Mr. Fisher's Bill has become law it is by far the most voluminous Education Act on the Statute Book. Turning its many pages we see that its greatness lies less in material changes than in a great new endeavour to make the nation think about education as they have never thought before.

THE CALL TO ACTION.

In keeping with the eloquent orations by which Mr. Fisher commended his bill to the country, the Act strikes a note of idealism, calling on the nation and on its governors, both central and local, to lift their eyes, and lift their hearts, to take a broadminded and long sighted survey of the nation's educational needs. After the bitter strife of past years, and in face of a great national emergency, the time is ripe to raise educational policy to a higher plane; to treat it as an affair of the spirit deeper than political, theological, and social differences; to unite all the forces of the nation in tolerance and charity for the protection and nurture of the growing body and the unfolding spirit and character of each individual child. Can it be done? There is a new spirit abroad recognising how greatly education increases national strength; that artificial barriers between different classes of the community must be removed; that in the period of adolescence the State must assume some firmer guardianship of youth; and that every child must be led to his appropriate development of intellectual, spiritual, and vocational efficiency.

A NATIONAL SURVEY.

Regarding the Act from this point of view, perhaps its most important clause is one that excited no debate in Parliament.

It is section 28, and completes the requirement that every school or educational institution in the land shall furnish the Board of Education with such particulars about itself as the Board may prescribe. There is probably no civilised country in Europe in which the Government knows so little of what is going on in the field of education as England; and without interfering with the excellent work and the valuable experiments carried on in very large numbers of private and other schools and institutions outside the Board's present system, the Board takes power to inform themselves and Parliament of the quantity and quality of the total provision of education in the country. Here will be food for thought and inspiration when all that is now hidden is laid bare and the work and ideals of every institution made public.

THE NEW DAWN.

The next great provision on these lines is in section 1, where every complete Local Authority is directed to contribute to the establishment of a national system of public education available for all persons capable of profiting thereby, by providing for the progressive development and comprehensive organisation of education in their area; and by section 6 they may co-operate and combine with other Authorities for matters of common interest which it is necessary or convenient to consider in relation to areas larger than those of individual Education Authorities. Thus the whole country is bidden to think and consult and make plans. For the prescribed machinery is the making of local schemes prepared in consultation with all minor authorities, and with parents or other persons or bodies of persons interested; with public inquiries and conferences in the background; and reports to Parliament and other publicity, and possible fines, as the compelling force. The whole field of national education is thrown open, the whole nation is bidden to think, and power is given to the Board of Education to compel them to act. The pith of the Act of 1870 was that sufficient elementary schools must be provided; the addition of 1902 was that Local Authorities should take such steps as seem to them desirable to supply education other than elementary. The addition of 1918 is that a complete national system must be progressively developed and comprehensively organised to the satisfaction of Parliament. This is the new dawn of greater things. Years may be required to fulfil this mandate, but the limitations which confined national effort to a few definitely prescribed material things are broken down, and the whole field is thrown open to the idealist, to see visions and to dream dreams, and to make dreams come true.

SOCIAL AND PHYSICAL WELFARE.

The most comprehensive of the new powers conferred by the Act are on the physical side. All schools and educational institutions in the country may be brought under the system of medical inspection and treatment recently introduced into the public elementary schools, and facilities for social and physical training in the day or evening may be provided in school or out of school in respect of any person of any age who is attending an educational institution. The whole nation from 2 years of age onwards may be enrolled in various kinds of schools, and educational institutions, and then the schools thrown open to the active medical service of the Board of Education and the Local Authorities. They are forbidden only to establish a general domiciliary service—the school is to be the centre—but working through the school the medical inspector and adviser lays his hand on the nation. And at the same time any school child is forbidden to be employed in any labour exercised by way of trade or for the purposes of gain before 12 years of age; or for more than two hours on any school day if over 12 years of age; and the employment of every working child is to be under the direct supervision and control of the school authorities.

THE EDUCATION MANDATE.

Educationally, the ideals and aspirations of educational reformers and the experiments of many years—too often frowned upon—are now crystallised in a direct mandate. Old powers are reinforced and some new ones given. They fall into three stages. For the infants nursery schools and classes from 2 years of age upwards may be recognised for all whose healthy physical and mental development require attention to their health, nourishment, and physical welfare. For the older scholars in elementary schools practical instruction in such subjects as cookery for girls and handicrafts for boys becomes obligatory; with advanced courses for the more intelligent children and their preparation for further education in other schools. And when the age of adolescence is reached all those who are not continuing their education in a suitable and efficient manner may be compelled to attend, for 320 hours a year, at free and obligatory continuation schools during their hours of employment, and their employers must release them for the purpose. Here is a programme of physical and mental training inscribed on the statute book. It embodies the plans of generations of educationists, it endorses work which is being done here and there. It is now established by Parliament as a settled national policy, which with wise and inspiring leadership and effective machinery and administration may gradually be brought into operation.

ADMINISTRATION.

The administrative machinery of education is renovated and lubricated in many details; but the larger issues of popular control and the problems of civil and religious liberty for teacher and scholar which have, for a century or more, made the education question the thorniest of political problems are carefully evaded. Parliament appeared to feel that the educational ideal should have its turn and a new resolve be registered. The stirrings of democracy as against both autocracy and bureaucracy, and the powers of ecclesiasticism in the civic sphere are both going through a greater test at the present moment than even the education question can supply. The next few years may settle these things in a drastic manner in this country and in others, and perhaps “take in its stride” the smaller issues underlying the problems of national education which in more normal times have seemed to be insoluble.

THE FUTURE.

At any rate this new Act is not the end. It is merely a measure of “administrative provisions” in all the practical reforms it embodies, but it enshrines a new spirit and a new hope. It is a trumpet call to the humblest educational worker to apply himself with a new energy and confidence to his own particular bit of work; and to the philosopher and statesman to see that in the reconstruction of society, which the war is bringing about, the educational machinery of the nation is established on free, unsectarian, and democratic lines. Let every lover of his country think of that.

BOOKS AND REVIEWS.

WAYFARINGS.

MANY "wayfarers" have told the story of their emancipation from the fetters of creed under which their souls could not grow, and of their emergence into a freer and brighter faith; but the story we read in these pages* has a special characteristic that gives it a place of its own amongst such narratives. From the rigid and heartless Calvinism under which the child was born to the serene and glowing creedlessness of the septuagenarian there is a progress, with many critical and decisive moments, but in which there are no terrible struggles between the restraints of still revered, loved, or feared traditions and the insistent demands and pressures of growing life. Our wayfarer never had to give up anything that he much valued at the moment when he abandoned it; nor can he well be said to have known the sudden relief from realised oppression that comes to a man when he can boldly say: "I don't believe it" of the creed that had darkened life to him. For it seems that to our hero the process was always one of quiet transformation and "metabolism" within, unaccompanied by any direct or conscious challenge of his creed for the time being, but independent of it, and then some transforming spiritual experience that opened up, as by a direct revelation, a new world of joy, of awe and of beauty, or, rather, laid a new and palpable reality of wonder and glory upon the old world, that transfigured it to the seer's eyes. Then he would look for his old creed to see how it consorted with his new life, and would find that it had simply gone; and at the same time the changed and transmuted life that had been developed within it would rush into union with the new joy of the revelation as something that belonged to it and had already unconsciously prepared to meet it.

Our "wayfarer" has a power that is very rare of recording these moments of insight and transfiguration in words of direct simplicity and clarity that make them realisable to the less sensitive reader as a veritable access to the world that he too knows, after his fashion and within the limits of his susceptibility. What the "wayfarer" sees is no unreal glamour that an over-excited mind casts over a drab world. It is something that is really there. And it is always a genuine and firsthand discovery on the wayfarer's part. He encounters its superlative expression in Wordsworth or Thoreau or Edward Carpenter, for instance, after he has received it direct and unexpected, as a sudden gift from objective realities outside himself; and in every case but one it is out of doors that he receives it. And it is this that makes the portions of his record that tell of his immediate commerce with nature overshadow, or rather outshine, to his reader the expository essays in which he tries to interpret "the greater comrades" of his journey, that is to say, the writers who have most enlarged and inspired his soul.

I have spoken as if moments of supreme vision were of frequent occurrence to our pilgrim. Relatively speaking this is so. He himself notes that "conversion," in all the manifold variety in which it is known to the "twice-born," is always assumed to come once for all. Every man must be "born again," perhaps, but it is assumed that he can only be born again once. Not so with our companion in these wayfarings. He feels that he has been "converted" many times, but never from anything, always to something, and always to something more of what he already had, and yet to something more that made it something other than it was; and always with a certain catastrophic decisiveness of expansion and change.

And the end is an old age of serene and intense peace and joy, profoundly agnostic, but yet more profoundly trustful and revering, that faces life and death with an impartial welcome, and that even the horror of the European war which broke upon it could only shake and could not disturb.

P. H. W.

THE DAUGHTER OF GOD.

THERE is a Buddhist story which relates how the great Master once turned in to the lowly hut of a barber and spake high things to him as though he were an equal to the saints. And when he was gone and the poor man had regained self-possession and composure after the wonderful experience, he burst out into a chant detailing the interview, every verse of which ends "Even to me—the Barber!" "And I said: 'Is Nirvana for such as I?' And he said 'Yes, for thee!' Even for me—the Barber!" The records of mysticism prove that no lowliness of condition is a barrier to transcendental experience. Jacob Boehme was a little man, of mean aspect, with low forehead and hooked nose, but he could have also chanted: "The Lord came even to me—a shoemaker!" And the "Good Armelle" was a peasant by birth and a domestic servant by occupation, yet she had experiences that would have made the young nun whom Sir Philip Neri visited at the Pope's instigation lift her nose still higher with spiritual pride than she is reported to have done. Without the help of any special training, Armelle Nicolas passed through all the steps to the final mystical union with God by her own instinctive aspiration and struggle. The ardent force of love and devotion in this young Frenchwoman (who died in 1671) was completely transfigured into devotion to her spiritual Lord, whom she addresses in the amorous language of lovers, and of whose caresses and favours she continually speaks with frank rapture. She must have been a very sensitive psychic, for the thought-forms bred by her Catholic faith, vivified, no doubt, by the inflow of Divine inspiration, assumed shape, colour, and vitality. She could see, hear, and feel in the concrete images used by religious art, or in symbolic drama, as objective operations, her spiritual or astral intuitions. One need not suppose the accompaniment of hysterical hallucination to invalidate the reality of her experiences; nor quarrel with the idiosyncrasy that would translate every subliminal inrush into terms of lovers' meetings and embraces. However sublimated, the energies of sex remain even in the saint. She was illiterate and of no account in the world, but she would have understood the phrase of St. Augustine introrsum ascendere, or the idea of St. Juan of the Cross's "Night of the Soul," or Ruysbroek's "incomprehensible joy of beatitude." Of her, as of another, it could be said: "What the sea is to the fish, and air is to the bird, and fire to the salamander, so is the heart of God to the daughter of love." For that was her favourite title, conferred, as she believed, by the Lord of Love Himself. Her story was written down by some nun or priest, and has been published in several languages. And now Mr. Thomas Taylor Allen has given an English translation to the world, which Messrs. Allenson have published as an important addition to the literature of mysticism. Most people would find it tedious reading, but to the student of psychology it offers another piece of evidence that, as Prof. W. James said, "there is about mystical utterances an eternal unanimity which ought to make a critic stop and think, and which brings it about that the mystical classics have neither birthday nor native land. Perpetually telling of the unity of man with God, their speech antedates languages, and they do not grow old." J. T. D.

"O CANADA!"

I RECENTLY made a visit to two large Canadian camps in the South of England, one consisting of 20,000 men, the other of 15,000. For five days I constantly had talks with various leaders and officers and in the evenings I addressed men gathered together in the Recreation Huts of the Canadian Y.M.C.A.—men from the most varied homes, from Prince Edward Island in the East, to Victoria in British Columbia in the West, who have offered themselves for military service in this country, crossing the Atlantic Ocean, and bringing a contribution to the British forces, the value of which is not to be estimated in statistics.

If one attempts to characterise the Canadian young manhood, what impresses one most is that self-dignity and independence which marks the man, due to the physical freedom of moving over large spaces. Magnificent rivers, wild forests, "ocean-like prairies," snow-capped mountains seem to have afforded an environment which has re-acted on the inner springs of individual and corporate life, and to have formed men of wide views and large hearts, from childhood onwards. The great fisheries, forests, and vast resources of wheat-lands, and the riches of the fur-trade, have made young Canadians believe that there is nothing in the world too good to be true, both from their country and themselves individually. It is wonderful, if we in the Old Country come to mix with these, our kinsmen, to realise that such men, with glorious careers before them, well-on-the-make, have, unhesitatingly, put aside their own selfish interests to help the cause of the Mother Country, in spite of the separation of distance of some thousands of miles, which have vanished before the intense imagination of these determined young free citizens, with whom it may be said, in so large a proportion of them, religion and politics are illuminated with living ideas in the mind, as the physical world is lit up with the sun. Wherever you go amongst them you hear in their talk: "Oh, you see his viewpoint is so and so"; "His proposition is" in such and such a direction. The Canadians live in an atmosphere of frank, independent, and considered views. One might go further, and say, in many cases, they are men of strong convictions.

And so into this war these men bring spacious faith in the cause for which we are fighting—and for Great Britain herself. It has been said that no one truly loves a person or country until he sees errors, faults, and weaknesses in the light of a smiling appeal to humour, without degeneration into cynicism. The Canadian is full of genial humour, deferentially conveyed, with a gentleman's tact, but never forgetting what his "country" and all other countries owe to England. As one of their own poets has said, clearly reflecting the general enthusiastic belief in the Mother Country:—

And whatever the people that dwell beneath,
Or whatever the alien tongue,
Over the freedom and peace of the world
Is the flag of England flung
Till the last great freedom is found,
And the last great truth be taught,
Till the last great deed be done,
And the last great battle is fought;
Till the last great fighter is slain in the last great fight,
And the war-wolf is dead in his den, England, breeder of hope and valour and might,
Iron mother of men.

Nowhere do you find a deeper determination that the war must be fought out to victory, and nowhere do free citizens of a free country adapt themselves more readily and more effectively to the new conditions of military life. More significant still is the absence, on the one hand, in the officers of any professional aloofness from men of inferior official rank when off duty; and the presence, on the other, of a desire to advance a good deal in the direction of anticipating the wishes and plans of each other—in other words, a camaraderie of goodwill and common aims.

* Wayfarings: a Record of Adventure and Liberation in the Life of the Spirit. By William J. Jupp. London: Headley Bros. Price 6s.

The Canadians who frequent the Y.M.C.A. Huts thus have the brotherly instinct, in spite of their enormous diversities. It is not only that they are united in their great adventure of military enterprise. They are not bound together for fighting as an end in itself, nor, indeed, mainly even to be a source of strength to the Mother Country. The war to them is an occasion of proof of fealty to their principles, of self-government, of freedom for all,—for small nations as well as big nations—for Serbia, for Belgium, for Poland. The fight for humanism, as against militarism, is no mere balancing of words. Canadians are pacifists essentially, and their greatest gift to the world may be, in the future, that of social organisation on the basis of individual independence. As one of the strongest and most efficient of captains said to me before I was about to lecture: "It is up to you to get and keep your grip on the boys. No one will 'support' you from the platform. I can assure you, if any Canadian does not feel you are giving him something worth while, he will move off, without a moment's hesitation. He won't pretend he is interested when he isn't."

In England, we should say, this attitude is bad for the lecturer or teacher, but the Canadians regard it as particularly good for him in what ought to be "his view-point." I believe they are right, and I believe they are right in many of the points where they differ from us. The fact is that the Englishman is an inarticulate person, whilst the Canadian is essentially articulate. He thinks; he would not use the soil to advantage if he didn't; and there is no one to do his thinking for him. He knows what he thinks; he is definite and decisive, for if he were not he would lose his opportunity. Neither Nature nor his human competitors wait; they go on acting, and he must do the same. Lastly, he can give expression to what he thinks. He is thoroughly articulate.

The Canadian camps, therefore, contain many groups of thinkers, which in their religious, social, and political philosophy would do credit to many an Oxford or Cambridge College, dons included. They have many men of the canny, cautiousness of a Socrates in approaching other people's opinions, and in seeking for information thereon. But, in the background, they have their own views, which sweep forward like a torrent from their inward vision, founded on personal experience of life, not second or third-hand leanings from books.

Man after man tells you this war will alter, or one should rather say intensify, the attitude of the Canadian, when he lays down his soldiership and returns to civil life in the soldier's spirit. It is the same vision as that of General Smuts: "We want to see greater happiness among all classes of the community. We want to see more justice in this country. We want to see less poverty and less luxury. We want to see better standards of living more generally diffused throughout the whole community; we want more economic freedom and security for all workers in a world in which, I hope, there will be no idlers, rich or poor."

Yes, Canadians will agree. Not only so, but there are dozens of the Canadians saying the same things as General Smuts, in language equally simple and forcible, every one a centre of profound influence amongst larger groups, who are good and active listeners. One point not perhaps sufficiently emphasised is the presence of the Canadian ministers of religion in the ranks. One of these told me he could not understand how an English clergyman could feel himself able to act as chaplain unless he had completed a reasonable length of actual military service. Another, minister of one of the largest of the churches in Toronto, was organising a highly successful Khaki College in the camp, where soldiers were informed that a class would be gladly undertaken in ancient Greek, if desired. At present war is the central duty of life to these men, but they realise that in the life of their country war is only a phase, interrupting the course of civilisation, which having been interrupted will start its course on a higher level and with ideals of humanism secured in the face of death, privation, suffering. For these ideals your normal Canadian is prepared both to live and to die.

Meantime, he goes about his tasks blithely, persistently, and in a concentrated manner. War is to him pioneering work. He has battled with physical forces, and has acquired will and energy to meet military brute force, as if, indeed, this were his only object in life. But there is a soul a-stir within him, which can be satisfied with nothing but a future world of humanism. And Canada's gift to the world after the war will be a surprise to many. "We mean," as one man put it to me, "to make the war worth while in the social future of our people."

UNDER THE PLANE TREE AT ELY.

WE were admiring the great plane tree in the Bishop's garden at Ely. "You get a better notion of the size of it," said the Bishop, "when you see two or three hundred people taking tea under its branches." The ex-moderator of the Established Kirk of Scotland and the Unitarian minister did not dispute the episcopal assertion. It was not difficult to visualise the scene, and taste the tea in imagination. The ex-moderator had come to Cambridge to discourse upon 'Unity between Christian Denominations'; and it seemed rather a curious fact that representatives of the two great State Churches in Britain, with a representative of the freest of all Free Churches, were gathered in friendly converse under the far spread branches of the great tree. So close together in space, under one tree, but what miles apart: gulfs unbridgable dividing us. And yet there were points of connection in the past. The Free Church minister had been drawn to the spot by a family tradition: in the private chapel of the Bishop's palace, close at hand, an ancestor of his had received ordination from a predecessor of the Bishop in 1768. The plane tree was more than a century old then. Planted, probably, at the Restoration, it had witnessed the great disruption of 1662. Would it witness a great reunion of the Churches of England and Scotland before it fell?

Possibly; astute adjustment may do much. But the thought of such a union recalls Abraham Lincoln's words: "I have never united myself to any Church because I have found difficulty in giving my assent without mental reservation, to the complicated statements of Christian doctrine which characterise their articles of belief and confession of faith. When any Church will inscribe over its altar as its sole qualification for membership the Saviour's condensed statement of the Gospel, that Church will I join with all my heart and all my soul."

THE INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE OF DIVINES.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—Look here upon this picture and on that." The one is the presentment of the Rev. Walter Short, whose memory you have so properly delighted to honour, and who died, as he had said of such a fate, "a glorious death in the service of God and country." Well may we say with Hamlet, "See what a grace was seated on this brow!"

The other picture discloses to us the Rev. Dr. Mellor of Liverpool, who proposes to deliver addresses and hold services in September, "which will be designed to direct thought and prayer towards the International Meeting of Christians of all countries, neutral and belligerent, which it is hoped to hold in the autumn," &c. "We must create the atmosphere," he says.

One of our ministers takes his life in his hands, and dies for righteousness. Another would meet in meek embrace men who have encouraged and excused the most bestial outrages, the most damnable atrocities, and who have shown no sign of sorrow or repentance! What words are strong enough to condemn him?

We cannot, I presume, stop Dr. Mellor and his friends from taking such action as they choose, but should he attempt to induce the British and Foreign or the Conference to send representatives to these meetings, I warn him that it will wreck that body, and split our ranks.—Yours, &c.,

JOHN C. WARREN.

SAILORS AND SOLDIERS IN HOSPITAL.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—The Committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association have made arrangements by which the names of Unitarian sailors and soldiers received at Essex Hall will be forwarded at once to the nearest minister, who will visit the hospital with as little delay as possible and afterwards communicate direct with the relatives. Several ministers have been doing this work regularly for some time past, and others have expressed their willingness to render this service to the wounded when called upon. If there is no minister living near, so that a railway journey is necessary before a visit can be made, the travelling expenses of ministers will be paid by the Association.—Yours, &c.,

W. COPELAND BOWIE, Secretary.
Essex Hall.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Atherton.—The local Weekly Journal, August 9, says: "Remembrance Day at Atherton was marked by a regrettable incident. At a time when the country is passing through one of the severest trials in its history, and when every section of the community, without distinction of class or creed, is making heavy sacrifices, it seems incredible that sectarian differences and prejudices should be allowed to creep in and mar an event such as a united intercession service. Yet this is what the members of one religious society in Atherton allege happened on Sunday. According to statements made by certain members of the Vigilance Committee, the Unitarian Church, better known as Chowbent Chapel, was not asked to the united service because the invitations were confined to churches represented on the Committee, and from that body the Unitarians were excluded at the time of its formation on religious grounds. We shall be greatly surprised if this explanation satisfies either the Unitarian body or sensible-minded citizens of Atherton. If anything, it is an aggravation of the offence. The aim of the Vigilance Committee, as we understand it, is to bring the churches together in closer unity with a view to undertaking a vigorous purity campaign in the district. Are the Unitarians unfitted to engage in a movement of this character, and on an occasion such as a united war intercession service are they so far beyond the pale that their co-religionists in Atherton cannot tolerate their presence at the proceedings? We cannot think that this is the view taken by the Atherton churches either individually or collectively. But what has happened warrants such an inference being drawn, and the sooner the Vigilance Committee puts itself right with the Unitarian body and the public regarding these matters the better for all concerned."—The Rev. J. J. Wright in his sermon, August 4, said we needed on Remembrance Day to clear our minds once again as to what the whole war meant. It meant might or right, militarism or liberty, world-slavery or world-freedom. For every nation on earth, for every man or woman alive, it was now either one or the other. Still further, on that day we would not forget the men who had fought and were fighting for us. Should we ourselves be worth fighting for if we did not remember these men? And if, in that chapel, and within their own hearts, they could not help thinking of their 140 boys away from home on this divine duty, and especially of the 18 or 20 boys who had laid down their lives for England and righteousness, it was because they were nearest and dearest to them, and to remember them that day made even that day more sacred to them. Finally, would the world, in the words of the text, "turn unto the Lord" as the result of the war? He did not know. But what he did know was that that was the world's only safety against worse wars in the future. Only a deeper sense of God and a higher sense of humanity was going to raise mankind above the lust and devilry of war. The world had tried everything else—diplomacy, balance of power, autocracy, democracy, trade, commerce, individualism, socialism, art, and music, science, and education—and yet it had landed itself in this most gigantically fiendish war. The religion of divine Sonship and human brotherhood, revealed and realised through Jesus Christ, was the only cure for war.—Last Sunday morning Mr. Wright's subject was 'Prussianism in Religion and Kaiserism in Atherton.'

Ballyclare.—The Rev. Percival Godding (2nd Lieut.), whose internment as a prisoner of war at Rastatt, Baden, has been recorded, reports that in consequence of the release of a chaplain at the camp he has been invited to conduct services, which are attended by some sixty fellow prisoners.

Bradford.—The Rev. A. Cobden Smith formerly of Holbeck, Leeds, has been cordially welcomed to the pastorate of Chapel Lane Church. Among the speakers were the Revs. Vivian Pomeroy and W. Paxton (Congregationalists). The former referred specially to the drawing together of the different denominations, and declared that the old spirit of aloofness between churches was henceforth impossible.

Colne.—The Quarterly Meeting of church members was held after evening service on Sunday. Considerably increased attendances at each service were reported, while the offerings and members' subscriptions were largely in excess of previous years. Arrangements are proceeding for a Sale of Work at the end of the year to clear off a debt of £155 and to assist the Church Funds.

Fallsworth.—The Dob Lane congregation and Sunday school, at the recent half-yearly meetings, reported fairly satisfactory progress under present conditions. The number of lads and men on their joint Roll of Honour is now 215.

Four have recently died, viz.: Private J. Coates and Bandsman F. Whalley, killed in action; Seaman E. Dodd, drowned through capsizing of ship's boat; and Private L. I. Gaskell, died in camp. Four are reported wounded, and the following are now known to be prisoners in Germany: Corporal A. Clough, Privates E. Booth, W. Travis, H. Sellers, and C. Moore. Private Harold Fielding is "missing."—A life-long member of the congregation, Mr. J. F. Partington, has died in his 58th year.

India: Khasi Hills.—The Rev. Nilmani Chakrabarti is visiting the Khasi Hills on behalf of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association and the Sadharan Brahmo Samaj. At Mowlong, Shella, Mastow, Nongwar, and Nonkraw people flocked round him and rejoiced to see their old father again in their midst. About ninety men and women attended the divine service conducted by him on the Sunday morning and felt inspired by hearing his edifying sermon. The Khasis do not worship idols, they are not slaves to custom and tradition, and the caste system is unknown to them. A leader of a village consisting of two hundred houses a few miles from Shillong, came to see the Rev. Nilmani Chakrabarti and asked him to establish there a Brahmo school and a Brahmo Samaj.

Johannesburg.—The little circle of friends here has held together by monthly services among themselves, but with ever-increasing difficulties due to their pastorless condition. If an energetic and tactful minister could be secured after the war—the possibility before then is too remote to hope for—it is felt that a large opportunity presents itself for the spread of Unitarian teaching and worship. Among the faithful attendants from the first, seven years ago, was Mrs. Holman, formerly of Lewes, whose death is recorded with much regret.

Leeds: Hunslet.—The celebration of the Jubilee of the Hunslet Church has already begun and will continue till the end of December. During this time the minister, the Rev. A. Leslie Smith, will frequently preach on the subject of the Unitarian faith and position with the object of kindling the love and deepening the loyalty of members of the congregation to their church. The Jubilee Fund will, it is hoped, grow from week to week, and in due time the appeal will be extended to other churches in the country.

Leeds: Mill Hill.—During August Lieut.-Col. Bullock is giving a series of sermons on 'Atheism,' 'Pantheism,' 'Materialism,' and 'Agnosticism' respectively, as alternatives to Theism. The first of these was delivered last Sunday morning, and the second last Sunday evening. In reference to Atheism, the preacher commenced with a reference to Paley's well-known argument from design which, he said, might have to be restated nowadays. When they saw a painting, they sought for the cause at the back of the effect, and found a painter. Then they had to seek for the cause of him. If God were the cause of the painter, did God require a cause? God was the consummation of all causes. He had argued this with street-corner "rationalists" in Leeds, and had always come back to the point that there must be a cause independent of all other causes. Atheism gave him no satisfactory explanation of the things round about him, while Theism did, for he could conceive of "nothing" becoming "something" under all-powerful hands, but not of itself. Cosmologically, the world was a world of order, not chaos; one ruled by government, and not by chance. Atheism had no satisfactory explanation for the order of things. It had been said that they no longer needed evidence of design, that Darwinism had killed it. But Prof. Huxley had said that the mechanical and the molecular arrangement of the universe were not in conflict. Every muscle in his system, every fibre in his being, called out against the argument that the body was self-made. Man could not have been the product of something that could not think. For the above reasons, he was not willing to accept the suggestion that, at the end of the war, they should give Atheism a trial, and see if, without God, man could build a better world than God had wrought with man. In reference to Pantheism, Col. Bullock said that this was Atheism under another name. It said that there was no personal God, from which it followed that there was nothing right or wrong. It was a source of several errors of the present day, e.g., Christian Science. The latter said that there was nothing but God in the world, and that, therefore, there could be no pain, because pain was not good. Such teaching was contrary to human experience, and was simply juggling with facts. If there were nothing in the world but God, how could they explain the present war? Had God divided Himself into two parts, and sent one into Germany, and the other into France? The theory was only true in the sense that everything in the world owed its origin to God. God had placed things in the world for man to use, and it was open to man to use them rightly or wrongly. If he did the latter, God could hardly be blamed for it.

The minister, the Rev. Nicol Cross, in a letter dated July 21, printed in The Record, says: "I last wrote you from the deserts of Egypt, to-day I am writing from a potato-field in Northern France. Instead of the interminable sand, I am looking round on verdant hills and avenues of trees." He is now stationed, it appears, somewhere on the Seine between Paris and the North Coast, "pitched fairly high, but also not dry" above the river, and he and his comrades in the R.A.M.C. are naturally hoping for leave before they are sent up the line. In a previous letter, written in Egypt on June 30, which also appears in The Record, Mr. Nicol Cross speaks in very plain language of the moral and spiritual dangers awaiting the lads we are sending out from our English homes, and of the appalling state of things in great cities like Cairo and Alexandria, which is ruining many of the men for life. "War," he says, "has been praised by certain Englishmen, as by Germans, as a tonic and a purifier, but my experience clearly is that as regards the soldiers themselves it is a negation of personality and manhood, which renders degeneration easy and to some extent almost inevitable.... It is a condition which good men will seek to terminate as soon as vital causes and interests permit. To prolong it a day beyond that, for merely material or purely imperialistic ends, would be a damning responsibility."—Second Lieut. Arthur Hirst has been awarded the Military Cross. He originally joined the ranks of the West Yorks, and now holds a commission in the York and Lancashire Regiment. James Fenton, a former member of the school, has been awarded the Military Medal for bravery in carrying in wounded under heavy fire.

Leeds: Yorkshire Unitarian Union.—At the recent Quarterly Meeting of the Yorkshire Unitarian Union there was a good attendance of representatives, including sixteen ministers, and the following resolutions, moved by the President, Mr. Grosvenor Talbot, J.P., and seconded by the Rev. W. L. Schroeder, M.A., were passed in silence, those present standing—Resolved: "That this Union place on record the deep sense of the loss sustained by the death of the Rev. Charles Hargrove, D.Litt., M.A., who as President for three years, and as friend and counsellor throughout the thirty-six years of his ministry at Mill Hill, proved his loyalty to the cause for which the Yorkshire Unitarian Union stands. An enlightened scholarship, an attractive personality, a zealous interest in the religious welfare of the people, and a high and devoted regard for the things of the spirit, combined to command the admiration and affection of those privileged in the work of the Union to be his colleagues and friends." Resolved: "That this Union, having heard with sorrow the sad news of the tragically sudden death of its honoured Treasurer, Mr. Julius Hess, who for nine years served the Union faithfully and well, record its sense of the loss sustained and its deep sympathy with Mrs. Hess and her daughter, to whom it would offer the tribute of a high and sincere regard for a man singularly modest, whose work elicited the praise of all who knew it." The meeting was held at the Mansion House, Roundhay, on the invitation of Mr. and Mrs. Geo. E. Verity, who entertained their guests to tea. The ministers held a meeting in the forenoon at Mill Hill Chapel vestry and the Rev. J. Hanson Green, M.A., of Holmfirth, read a paper on 'Christ among the Doctors: Some Thoughts on the Church and Education.'

Liverpool District Missionary Association.—It has not yet been decided what form the combined efforts of the churches of the Association will take during the winter, but it is hoped that at least two, and possibly more, United Services will be held similar to that in Hope Street Church in April last when Dr. Jacks preached. The first service will probably be held at the same church on October 10.

Ottawa, Canada.—Lieut.-Col. C. S. Bullock having definitely resigned his ministry at Ottawa, the congregation have appointed the Rev. H. J. Adlard as his successor. Mr. Adlard has been in charge of the Unitarian Church at Dunkirk, N.Y., for the past five years, where he has taken an active part in the religious, intellectual, and social life of the community.

Rochdale.—Last week a very happy and inspiring series of services and meetings were held at Clover Street in celebration of the centenary of the church. In addition to the Rev. John Evans, pastor loci, the Rev. T. P. Spedding, a former pastor during twenty-one years, took part. The collections and donations amounted to £169.

Stalybridge.—The Men's Class in connection with the Unitarian Church, in spite of the difficulties of the present time, is "carrying on," and some excellent papers have been read during the past session. The Class was numerically very strong before the war, but forty-eight members are at present serving with the forces, and five of the number have made the supreme sacrifice. It is encouraging to note that when the lads are home on leave they seem to make it a point of honour to attend the class, thus showing what a hold the school has upon their affections. In December the class learned with great regret of the death of Private J. Dearnaley, who was killed in an air-raid in France.

AMONG the recipients of the Military Cross at the recent investiture by the King was Capt. J. H. Bounds of the 2/3rd East Lancashire Field Ambulance. The name of Capt. Bounds will be familiar to those who have noted the various occasions in which he has assisted the arrangements made by the Rev. T. P. Spedding in his camp visitations, especially in connection with work at Crowborough and Colchester, where at one time nearly one hundred Unitarians were stationed. Capt. Bounds was recommended for the Military Cross for special service on two occasions. During the retirement of the 5th Army he succeeded in bringing wounded men from under fire, and his action led also to some sixty men, who had made up their minds to capture, effecting a safe retreat. On the second occasion Capt. Bounds took waggons for medical stores which he obtained from a store that had been abandoned and was even then under German gun fire.

MRS. WALTER SHORT writes warning the anxious or bereaved against impostors who claim special knowledge of soldiers named in the lists of missing or killed, and one of whom has called professing to be a friend of her late husband Capt. Walter Short. In her case the imposture did not lead to serious financial loss, such as we know to have been unfortunately suffered in other cases. The War Office authorities have received information about several of these most despicable of swindlers, and if any one is approached in a similar manner he or she will do well not only to be on guard but, if possible, to take such action as may lead to a conviction.

THE STORM.

Twelve Sermons preached at Rosslyn Hill Chapel Hampstead, and Manchester College, Oxford.

BY

Rev. HENRY GOW, B.A.

The sermons are written by one who believes with President Wilson that "right is more precious than peace," and that no personal sorrow or loss should discourage us and turn us from our firm resolve to overthrow the Prussian autocracy. They are written too in the growing confidence that faith in God and in the supremacy of Love has become more and not less possible and real through the conflict and agony of recent times.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

All letters and manuscripts for the Editor should be sent to 13 Bream's Buildings, Fetter Lane, London, E.C.4. They must reach the Editor not later than Wednesday morning for publication the same week.

CONTINUING his articles in The Star, Dr. Jacks has this week further elucidated his scheme of International Insurance, to which we have already drawn attention. He holds that his proposal is manifestly a more promising step than that of any forced League of Nations, the idea of which, indeed, appears self-contradictory. To draw together in providing a common fund for common needs is, he believes, a practicable beginning for a real League; it would give a precise and concrete bit of work for such a League to do. Obviously, the subject demands and deserves very careful study, and we hope these articles will be cast by Dr. Jacks into book form ere long, so as to make appeal to that part of the world that does not happen to bask in the ray of our lively evening contemporary.

* * *

WITH the merits of the 'bus strikers' case this week we need not deal here; there has been general approval of the women's argument that equal work should have equal pay. But is there not a lamentable lack of commonsense, not to say wisdom, in having no other method of securing a decision than this? How much loss of time, of money, and of comfort—perhaps of much more than comfort—this strike has entailed can be best imagined by those who have been among the hapless crowds of workers morning and evening. That it has been on the whole borne with reasonable cheerfulness does not in any degree prove that it is a reasonable way of settling disputes of the kind. Observing such incidents one is inclined to agree with the worthy who was sure the world was not yet near its end, it being so clearly in the stage of crude adolescence.

DR. HENSON has started a new correspondence in The Times, on Reunion. He specially urges that it should begin at home. "Not less perverse than the morality which wept for the woes of slaves in Africa while indifferent to the deeper miseries of factory-children in England is the ardour which seeks ecclesiastical agreement with foreigners abroad while acquiescing in isolation from Christian neighbours at home." Reunion, he says, must be based either on the "political" ground of one type of ecclesiastical government, or the "evangelical," which unites on a "fundamental faith." He points to the service on August 4, in the nave of Canterbury Cathedral, organised with the Archbishop's approval, in which Nonconformist ministers prayed and preached, and believes the example will have a good effect in every parish in the country. We wish it may. Canon Streeter supports Dr. Henson; "unless we can achieve a League of Churches, and that soon, organised Christianity will be demonstrated bankrupt." Other clerics, without demurring to the plea, still emphasise the necessity of episcopacy. The real difficulty, as ever, is to persuade men to think more of the end than of the means.

THE REV. ALEX. WEBSTER, whose death we record, was in his way a man of genius, remarkable for his intellectual ability and his practical activity. Keen of mind, with a Scotsman's love of theological argument, he was an observant student of progressive movements of thought and life, and he proved himself a diligent worker on their behalf. He was widely read in the literature of his native land, and with tireless energy he poured out his incisive and stimulating thoughts in pulpit and press. A democrat to the core, he attacked the citadels of privilege and wealth with a vigour that sometimes startled his friends as well as angered his enemies. The last time we saw Mr. Webster standing on the Broad Hill, among the sand dunes skirting the sea at Aberdeen, he looked a veritable prophet of the Lord as, with outstretched arm, his grey locks caught in the breeze, he proclaimed the words of truth and righteousness to the assembled crowd. The Unitarian ministry has attracted varied types of men, some of whom meteor-like have come and gone, leaving only a trailing and rapidly disappearing cloud behind. Mr. Webster in early manhood became a Unitarian; and with growing confidence he continued until the end. He travelled far and wide in all weathers that he might proclaim a free religious faith to his fellow-countrymen. An honest thinker, an earnest worker, a sincere friend, if any man ever deserved the "Well done, good and faithful servant," that man was Alexander Webster.

AN impression has got abroad that the Brahmo Samaj, the Indian theistic church, is largely political. We note with interest a passage in The Indian Messenger—which, mutatis mutandis, might have been written about Unitarians and their churches here. "The Brahmo Samaj," says our contemporary, "is a religious organisation, and as such has no politics of its own. Brahmos certainly have, but these they have, not as members of the Brahmo Samaj, but as citizens. It is quite natural that they should find themselves divided in the matter of politics. We have amongst us cautious administrators, members of Councils, Government officials, and young and old enthusiasts. It is idle to expect that their politics will be of one uniform kind. Everybody is free to his own political views. But one thing we can expect of the members of the Brahmo Samaj. And it is this, that they will take good care not to import their political differences into the work of the Brahmo Samaj. There can be no greater disservice done to the cause of theism in India than to import political differences into its work with the inevitable result of wrecking the work itself in which all are equally interested."

IN the June issue of The Museums Journal Miss Ethel M. Spiller, of the Art Teachers' Guild, gives a lively picture of efforts made at the Victoria and Albert Museum to interest children, from the baby stage upward, in the contents of some of the galleries, and this, not by pointing out their beauty alone, but by way of practical copying of pictures, drawing of curios, sharing in needlework, weaving, block-cutting and printing, and so forth. The object was not merely to make a happy holiday for the children, but, as she says, to "teach young people to read a museum." Fortunate young people they will be if they are delivered from the sense of deadly dullness which, to tell the truth, evidently afflicts most visitors to art museums, who, surrounded by things exquisite and eloquent of human aspirations, catch no gleam even of wonder. "The least satisfactory sight is the profound ignorance of many of the great public-school boys, who maintain a supercilious air throughout, and to whom, because of this attitude of mind, nothing in a museum can speak." We think we know some older people to whom the friendly guidance in their youth of such helpers as Miss Spiller would have been a priceless boon. Well, it's never too late to learn, and not all our treasures are shut up "during the war."

IN a recent speech delivered by Sir J. Compton-Rickett, M.P., at a meeting of the London Council for the promotion of Public Morality, the Bishop of London presiding, a strong plea was urged on behalf of providing opportunities for wholesome intercourse between young people in our great cities. "Repression will make vice difficult, but will not destroy it.... The respectability of the religious world does not end with repression. It must build up a sweeter and sounder morality. It is a costly matter to rescue the lost. It is far cheaper to keep the soul unsoiled." The speaker urged the opening of canteens at the churches where young people could meet for amusement and refreshment. "Even if those who draw near to the Father's house should hear music and dancing, that would be better than finding only a charwoman in charge.... In the light of the war we are beginning to realise as churches a larger duty. Religion must be taught unconventionally as well as conventionally." It is good to hear that tone, and to believe that Sir Joseph speaks for a great many laymen, and not a few clerics, in the churches at large.

BANKERS are busy reminding their customers that on and after September 1 every cheque must bear an additional penny stamp. Those of our readers who wish to save their pence should see to it that their subscriptions to our Chapels and Missionary Associations are dispatched to the respective treasurers before the end of August. If they have paid all such dues already and still wish to enjoy a thrifty mood in the very act of disbursement, our Belgian Fund would be an excellent "objective," and the heavier the bombardment the better.

THEIR MUSIC.

GEORGE ELIOT said it was "the gladness of the world." And yet she was not unacquainted with a world that had in it many sorrows, blots, and desolations. Her conception of things was not one moulded by genial wishes, but by serious thought upon that inflexible order in nature and in morals which must be accepted and obeyed. In some respects her world was darker, we think, than it might have been had she been able to cherish a philosophy less stern. But, with all her sensitiveness to life's tragedies, that great writer possessed the priceless gift of humour, and it is humour's way to convert even gloom to its own uses. In the midst of life's worst it is possible to recall its best, and to use the blackness of the background as so much better means for heightening the high lights of the picture. We also, as well as George Eliot, if we have a little of her wisdom, may permit ourselves to dream of a heavenly life, though brought as we are from day to day "nigh unto the gates of death." Beside the things which dim the eyes and furrow the brow, there are smiles yet, and there is the duty of creating them.

So, in this hour of the world, when its sadness rather than its gladness presses upon the mind, and when the very grace and golden bounty of earth seem ironically to render more bitter the bitterness of man's lot, we may as of old be moved by this writer's words to take heart again, not merely to endure but—what might seem more difficult, yet is to honest effort easier—to help others to endure. She pictured in those memorable words, happily familiar, her "choir invisible" as giving an undying music to the world, a music that in perpetual triumph over death helps the world to live victoriously. The "gladness" which their strains inspired was clearly, in her idea, far elevated above a transient pleasantness. It was a light penetrating to the deepest depths of the soul. In it was included the joy of the generous, the exultation of the bold who dare all things for the sake of right, the superb disdain of selfish aims, and the consciousness of purposes lofty and pure, that "pierce the night like stars," and persist till their greater issues are attained.

Such fine births of soul, then, attend the music of that glorious company of the "immortal dead." Such is the character of that high "gladness" with which, were it possible, it would be well to be suffused even in this hour. It is possible. No one, indeed, less courageously a believer than St. Paul dare reckon the sufferings of the present time as a "light affliction"; but there are some, and we believe many, who very truly, however strangely, even inexplicably, have known something of the noble energy of spirit that loyally accepts the conditions laid down for this generation, and counts it far from being the least blessed in having been set such great things to do, to live for or to die. Now, let us heartily maintain that, while to have been thus quickened is a wonderful addition to our existence, there is a greater addition yet, and just as possible. It is to share not only as receivers but givers of this "music"—this high "gladness." It is to have had the prayer already granted in part, and while still visible to one another to have joined the invisible choir, and to be taking our share already in that benign activity that sways to good the growing life of man.

Here, we know well, the choicest souls do most and best; yet here also the humblest sincere lover of his kind can really do something and do it well. The gallant hearted comrade in toil as well as in fight, the bright-witted companion who by his magic can strike sparks out of flinty circumstances and with a jest exorcise dismay and dudgeon, the friend whose understanding glance is worth more than all the mere words of strangers untried,—these and all others who help the day along and keep alive the lamps of trust when the night is darkest, are they not, as really as they are modestly, among the minstrels of the world's "gladness"? As the wise phrase runs, these are they who "add sunshine to daylight." They make life more worth while; and if, in their child-like naïveté, they move to dull scorn the philosophers who can conclusively prove (if anyone cared to listen to them) that "that which is crooked cannot be made straight," such people have somehow an undeniable record of helping. It has even been granted to some of them to be to other souls "the cup of strength" in the "great agony" of our days, and to give heart's peace in place of despair. If the comforted have been thus blessed how great must be the gladness of the comforters! Well may he, of all men, who thinks of his dead as still "living unto God," and who knows from his own experience how their music helps him, seek even now to join them in their ministry of inspiration and joy.

EDUCATION AND THE FUTURE.

MANY of your readers must have rejoiced as they read Mr. A. J. Mundella's article in THE INQUIRER. For more years than I can reckon, he has laboured with diligence and patience for progress and efficiency in national education. The career of an ardent reformer of education in England (it has been better in Scotland) is arduous and tempestuous. It has often proved a laborious and disappointing task to persuade members of Parliament, or to arouse the general public, to take any keen or intelligent interest in questions of educational theory or policy. Some of us have attended conferences, addressed meetings, written memoranda without end, only to find that our time and thought and labour were apparently in vain. Few people could be induced to trouble themselves over so dull a topic as the training and development of the minds and bodies of the children of the nation. It required some "Beer and Bible" cry to kindle interest or arouse either sympathy or antagonism to what the educational reformer was after. Governments, Liberal as well as Conservative, seemed to regard the Education Department as a suitable place to which to send a party politician who was unfitted to become a Secretary of State; and if by chance a really able man found his way there, the office was apparently regarded as a political stepping-stone to something higher and better. Again and again, before an Education Minister had succeeded in completing the task to which he had set his hand, he was "promoted." No wonder that educational reformers were frequently in despair over the apathy and folly displayed by the leaders of political parties.

The war has brought into temporary prominence in the management of the affairs of the nation not a few incompetents and failures; but one of its conspicuous successes was the appointment of Mr. Fisher as Minister of Education. Here was a man possessing knowledge, capacity, eloquence, and, above all, imagination and vision. He set himself to work with the determination to succeed. Disappointments and difficulties did not daunt his courage, or turn him aside from his main object. He was ready to profit by criticism and experience; and if he could not get all he desired, he was too wise a man to fret and sulk over his task. He shovelled on one side the hot cinders accumulated by sectarian and theological controversy; and if there remains the possibility that the cinders may be fanned into flame after the war, probably Mr. Fisher is hopeful that the good results flowing from the Education Act will make the general public, and especially working men and women, impatient of priests and bigots of every class and name, and thus enable him to round off and complete a magnificent scheme of national education.

In the course of a fairly long experience, I do not remember ever having read a leading article in The Times so full of discernment and enthusiasm for a large and generous system of national education as the one that appeared when the new Education Bill became an Act of Parliament. Lord Sheffield himself, the doyen of educational reformers, whose life-long labours have constituted so largely to the progress of education in this country, could not have written more enthusiastically than the leader-writer of the article 'Towards Reconstruction' on August 10. Let me with special satisfaction in consideration of the appearance of such views in The Times transcribe a few sentences:—

"The Education Act of 1918 is destined, we believe, to influence for good the lives of countless men and women in the unknown future, and to play no inconsiderable part in the rebuilding of all that has been shattered in English life during the last four years of violence and upheaval.... Although the Act is a war-measure, it is also a great peace-measure; and we believe that when the historian of the future, sifting the dust from the grains of endeavour, weighs our national contribution in the scales, he will not fail to remember that, at the very crisis of our fate, we fought not only for the immediate freedom of the world, but also for the freedom of the next generation. That is the real meaning of the Education Act. It is a charter of justice, freedom, and opportunity for English children.... The intention of all the provisions of this Act is to open wide the gates of opportunity. How far that intention is carried out will depend mainly on the energy and public spirit of the local authorities to whom largely increased powers are now entrusted." Nothing could be better said.

BOOKS AND REVIEWS.

A BISHOP CONSOLES.*

THIS little book is dedicated by the Bishop to the memory of the brave sons of his bereaved clergy and their wives, "who have given their lives to God and their country in the present war." It is a book of thoughtful reasoning in the light of modern knowledge and the Christian experience of a man of devout heart, urging the naturalness of death, and the continuity of life, which death cannot interrupt. It does not touch directly upon the bitter tragedies and soul-stirring experiences of the present time, but with wholesome sense and true benevolence offers consolatory thoughts and wise counsel concerning life as a moral discipline, the inevitable ending of its earthly stage, and the right preparation to be made for that which comes after.

It is not well, in Dr. Diggle's view, to attempt to pry into the future, beyond the information given us and the limits laid down in Holy Scripture. For himself, he asks for no messages from the dead, and while admitting that apart from all charlatanism there are people of sane and sober habits of thinking given to the investigation of the phenomena of modern spiritualism, the chief lesson he draws from this is that materialism has left men hungry and thirsty and sick. There is, he holds, a better way, and "the best medicine for spiritualism is spirituality." What we should aim at is a right interpretation of the teaching of the gospel, "in terms of mental, moral, and spiritual reasonableness."

That being so, one wonders a little at certain things the Bishop accepts as fact, on the ground that they are revealed in Scripture. He speaks very definitely, for instance, of the spiritual body with which Christ descended into Hades (not "Hell") to preach to the spiritual bodies of the long waiting dead, and with which he welcomed the spiritual body of the repentant robber. This, he declares, is not to be confounded with the risen body, which subsequently left the sepulchre, without disturbing the linen clothes, and on divers occasions appeared to those who believed on the Lord and loved him. That risen body was, so to speak, the completion and final form of Christ's spiritual body, as ours will be at the general resurrection on the last day.

But while we may differ from the Bishop's estimate of the authority and value of such definite statements regarding future conditions, this does not prevent the satisfaction with which we follow the broader lines of his reasoning and listen to his counsel as to the essential facts of personal and spiritual life. The body, as the instrument of our life here, he reminds us, is dying daily, while yet the personality, that which we are, remains. So we ought to realise, when the garment of the flesh is finally laid aside, the man remains, as truly alive, though under different conditions, in the hereafter. Throughout our life here it is the making of the man, the formation of character, the development of personal spiritual power, on right lines of obedience, reverence, trust, and love, that must be our chief concern. There is no other way rightly to prepare for the future. A death-bed repentance is a poor thing. As to the end of our mortal life, it is well for us that the time of its coming is shrouded in uncertainty, for that is not our concern and the uncertainty should keep us attentive to the vital things of character and present duty. There are insidious dangers of mental, moral, and spiritual death, which attack and often overcome a man, while he is still in the flesh. It is against these that he must guard. As to what shall be hereafter, the Bishop leaves us with the quiet assurance that "nothing will happen within the veil at variance, or out of keeping, with the mercy and the justice of God." It is good teaching, and there are many at this time to whom it will come as a message of comfort and strength.

AN ABUSED BOOKLET.

LET me call the attention of your readers to a booklet written by Mr. Ignatius Singer of Bradford on 'The Theocracy of Jesus' (C. W. Daniel, Ltd., 1s. net). The paper was originally read at one of the conferences on the 'Practise of Religion' held in Bank Street school last winter—not, as stated in the preface, "before the 'Brotherhood' affiliated with Bank Street Chapel," for there is no such 'Brotherhood.' It provoked a good deal of discussion and interest on that occasion, and I hope that its publication may carry the author's message to a much wider field. It is specially deserving of the consideration of members of our own group of churches because in the main its conclusions are characteristically Unitarian. Moreover, as an attempt to interpret one aspect of the teaching of Jesus in the light, not of Christian tradition and dogma, but of scientific commonsense and literary probability it should be welcome to those of us who are pledged to the pursuit of truth, and who maintain the responsibility of freedom in religion.

The only public notice so far taken of the booklet (so far as I am aware) is in a publication known as The Faith and the Flock, and in one of "Artifex's" Manchester Guardian articles. The former is apparently a super-orthodox journal, which finds it "difficult to understand" "how any audience that had any respect for its own intelligence could listen to the end to such a production." The review in this journal should itself be a recommendation to the booklet for all who do not confuse intelligence and credulity. Canon Peter Green ("Artifex") is frankly abusive—one would have thought that this kind of attempt to discountenance inquiry in matters theological would have been alien to the Canon's spirit. But it appears that even "liberal" Christians can become infuriated by the attempt, especially on the part of a scientific layman, to read the gospels in the sunshine of common sense, instead of the "dim, religious light" of ecclesiastical tradition.

I commend Mr. Singer's booklet very warmly to the attention of readers of THE INQUIRER.

THE PROPOSED INTERNATIONAL CHRISTIAN MEETING.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—It is with very great regret that I find myself obliged to differ from one of our most honoured leaders in the moral that he draws from the recent death of the Rev. Walter Short at the front, which he contrasts with Dr. Mellor's September addresses in connection with the proposed International Christian Meeting.

I hope that others, whose words will carry more weight than mine, will reply to Mr. Warren, but meanwhile, as one who very much hopes that the British and Foreign Unitarian Association may be represented at the meeting, I venture to suggest to your readers another point of view.

I hope Mr. Warren will feel able to believe that it is from no desire to excuse German outrages, nor from any lack of respect for the memory of the late Rev. Walter Short and others who have fallen in the war, that I support the idea of the International Christian Meeting.

1. It seems to me that every addition to the casualty list increases the duty of those at home to watch and work for every possible means of eradicating the spirit of militarism and of laying the basis for a more reasonable and more humane method of settling international affairs than war. The Rev. Walter Short believed his duty led him to the trenches, and we rightly honour him because he chose what was to him the path of duty; but it must not be forgotten that many ministers honestly believe and have been encouraged to believe that their duty lay at home, helping to guard our national life from the poison of that spirit of hatred and revenge which is so apt to be bred in time of war, and fostering the spirit of human sympathy and conciliation which is essential if the objects for which the Rev. Walter Short died are really to be gained.

2. Sometime the representatives of the nations now at war will have to meet to arrange peace. They have already met to discuss questions concerning prisoners of war—but terms of peace will be of little permanent use unless behind the hands that sign the terms there are nations with an honest true desire and will for a real peace. It is for us at home to foster that desire and will for peace in our own nation and, whenever we have an opportunity, in other nations also.

For these reasons I welcome all meetings between the belligerent nations as possible openings to the fulfilment of our objects. Meetings of members of a particular trade or profession or of holders of a particular political theory may all have their uses, but inasmuch as they are sectional, there is with them always the danger that they may create fresh divisions. This objection does not apply to the International Christian Meeting, whose object is to find a basis of unity stronger and deeper and broader than the forces that divide us, a means of approach which (in the words of Lord Parmoor) "should initiate conciliation even with those who have deeply offended us, and then surely we may not be without hope that the terrible war cloud may be dispersed and we may have a new era of Christian hope, charity, and peace."

Sir, these seem to me sufficiently strong arguments for supporting wholeheartedly the proposed International Christian Meeting, but for me they are strengthened and confirmed by all I have learned to honour in our Unitarian traditions and the reasonable practical Christianity which is the Unitarian inheritance. Thanks to my Unitarian upbringing, confirmed more and more by experience, I have been led to believe in the response of mankind to the appeal of reason and self-sacrificing love, and in the necessity of overcoming evil with good, and to try to apply my religious principles to present-day problems. The international problem is the most urgent of all at this time. It is a problem worthy of our mettle. What nobler work can we take up than the attempt to bring to bear upon it the principles of our faith. Along the lines of the International Christian Meeting we have a grand opportunity of proving the worth of Unitarian Christianity and seeking an honourable solution of our present difficulties. By other means we may lop off branches, but this is surely the only hopeful way of permanently uprooting the evil spirit which now poisons international life. If we do not uproot it, the Rev. Walter Short and all those who have given their lives on the field of battle will have died in vain.—Yours, &c.,

'THINK ABOUT EDUCATION.'

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—Mr. Mundella's article 'Think about Education' has the right note in it. Every one who comes in contact with working men must acknowledge how clamant and insistent is their demand for higher education for their children. The difficulty with them, however, is that they do not know how to secure this educational privilege. It therefore behoves us who are able, to see how much is allowed by the Fisher Bill, what claims the working classes may make for their children's improved education. It is only by the pressure of public opinion that Education Committees will act. It is my experience that they are not pioneers, but on the other hand require gentle prodding on.

By section 7 there is no limit to the expenditure that may be incurred by an Education Committee for education other than elementary. By section 24 an Education Committee can provide maintenance allowances, and section 32 provides for the setting up of central classes and schools, so that nothing now stands in the way of an Education Committee granting further education to all children likely to profit by it. If they would all follow the example of Sheffield and free the municipal secondary schools a step would be taken the effect of which is incalculable.

Section 17 allows Education Committees to provide playing fields, school swimming baths, school baths, and holiday camps, so it is to be hoped that demands will be made for all these boons. Section 7 allows no exemption under 14 or 15 if the Local Education Authority so desires. It is essential that local demands shall arise with the object of lengthening the child's stay at school. All these sections of the Act are in force to-day and if public opinion were at once instructed, a great step would be taken in broadening the outlook of the people and of granting the amenities of life to those who otherwise would become only cogs and wheels in the industrial machine.—Yours, &c.

JAPAN AND UNITARIANISM.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—The note in your last issue recording the honour paid to the Rev. Clay MacCauley, a Unitarian minister, in appreciation of his work in Japan in uplifting the life of the whole community, and the reports in the daily press of the arrival in this country last week of Prince Tokugawa, President of the Red Cross Society of Japan, has recalled to my memory that on Sunday, March 28, 1886, in the Free Christian Church, Kentish Town, the Marquis Tokugawa, a relative of the Tycoon of Japan, was received into the Christian Church, the rite of baptism being performed at the close of the morning service by the Rev. James Panton Ham, and at its conclusion a copy of the Revised Version of the Bible, with a short address, was presented to the Marquis (a pupil of Mr. Ham) in the name of the congregation by the secretary of the church, Mr. Charles Hind. I have a pleasant memory of the occasion, having been one of those present who welcomed him into the Christian faith.

At the Annual Meeting of the congregation, held in the following year, on January 25, a very interesting address was given by the Marquis Tokugawa respecting the introduction of the principles of Unitarian Christianity into his native country and concluded as follows: "I am also very glad that the time has come to fulfil the sincere desire of the respected secretary of this church. When I was baptised last year, in this very church, he gave me a handsome present (the Bible), and asked me to let my fellow-countrymen know the true teaching of our Lord Jesus Christ on the one Godhead and the one brotherhood of mankind. I will endeavour as much as I can, to introduce the true Christianity which I am professing to our dear Japan."

Thinking the above may be of interest to your readers.—Yours, &c.,

THE CAMBRIDGE SUMMER SCHOOL.

ECONOMY of space allows little more than a mention of the holding of the Summer School at Cambridge this year in an endeavour to study the United States of America. A general impression of the lectures is impossible, so immense is the ground to be covered, so astounding the array of facts and figures, so many-faceted the orb of tendencies, energies, ambitions, and achievements, so grandiose and architectural the plans projected. The difficulty of generalising on this vast subject was manifest. The lecturers gave a series of acute analyses of sections of reality in America, always inducing a sense of bigness in things done, to be done, or wanting doing, that left their hearers exhausted in the effort to grasp them. Perhaps the attempt to cover such an area, to spread themselves so extensively, was sufficient to explain why we did not feel ourselves taken, on the whole, so high or so deep as on other occasions, except when we came to the war. Not quite so often did that strange but immediately recognisable quality we may call revelation strike home to us. Yet there were precious and revealing moments.

The United States of America was treated historically, geographically, politically, municipally, educationally (particularly educationally), morally, and from the points of view of science, the press, scientific medicine, architecture, and literature. Yale was represented by Dr. Burnstead, Dr. Canby, and Mr. G. H. Nettleton; Harvard by Dr. Santayana, Mr. F. C. de Sumichrast and Mr. Jerome D. Greene; Columbia by Dr. Cunliffe; Johns Hopkins by Sir William Osler. The difficulties in the way of lecturers and audience when the claims of military and national service are remembered were naturally great, and limited the number of speakers and hearers. The latter counted this year something over four hundred, a small number comparatively, and consisted largely of women, though there was a fair "sprinkling" of men. As most of these people act as vehicles of ideas, many being in the teaching profession, the essence of the lectures reaches a greater audience than actually heard them.

The balance between materialism and idealism in the United States seemed to be held until the description of the country's attitude towards and organisation for the war definitely weighed the scale down for idealism. There was absolute unanimity here in the lecturers. The people entered on the war for an ideal, on a clear-cut alternative of ideas. Knowing precisely what they are fighting for, they will never cease from fight until they have got it. Their gradual and largely unwilling arrival at their present point of view, which, as General Biddle insisted in the inaugural lecture, reverses all their former policy, their slow because incredulous awaking to the moral issues involved, making neutrality either a crime or a stupidity, the welding into one of the many-languaged, many-natured nation on an ideal issue, is a moral triumph unparalleled in the world's history, and is matched in the physical sphere by the stupendous measures taken to further it. The systematised subordination, done voluntarily and nationally, of all the parts to the whole, of all purposes to one purpose, presents a spectacle awe-inspiring to their Allies and awful to their enemies. As we listened to the account of miracles done or doing, of world-forces being marshalled for the Right, some of us must have had a vision of the Allies of the Old World standing in the breach for four years, while the tempest of barbarism raged and menaced in front and treachery secretly undermined or stabbed behind; decimated, slaughtered, agonising, but always standing in the breach and keeping back the tide. And now comes this Michael of the New World, young-eyed and clear-eyed, invincible in arms and in heart, winging his strong flight over the seas where those impotent devilries lurk, to stand beside them—at last! Those of us who survive may well exult at this hour (even if we have learnt, in four years, to rejoice with trembling) that those of us who have died, our martyred multitudes, have not died in vain. One could detect a note of thankfulness in the lecturers that America had not to her own undoing made the Great Renunciation.

Prof. Canby in his examination of the spirit and tendencies of American contemporary literature insisted that this will be another tree, not another branch, though it was grafted from British literature. He made the interesting forecast that America, idealistic and democratic, may find a literature for the new democracy coming after the war; but it will not be by imitation, nor by fine writing, nor by strangeness. It is unfortunate that Emerson was inadequately treated, but Lowell and Whitman found masterly interpreters in Mr. A. J. Wyatt and Mr. P. L. Babington respectively. The high water-mark of personal interpretation was reached by Lord Charnwood in his lectures on Abraham Lincoln. The intense vision and power of them solemnised his hearers as if by a sense of contact with the god-like figure he presented. We could not fail to be struck by the parallelism of events and contentions with those of to-day. "We did not make this war," said Lincoln, answering the familiar "pacifist," "we accepted it.... The war will end when the definite purpose for which we entered it is accomplished. Please God, the war will never end, unless the purpose is accomplished." And yet, said Lord Charnwood, he was the most tenderhearted person who ever wielded great power.

Dr. Santayana's exquisite and subtle lecture on 'William James and Josiah Royce' had only one fault: it ended too soon.

The accompanying course on 'Unity' between denominations, between nations, and between classes, was scarcely secondary in interest to the other. Prompted and fostered by experience in men and things at the front, where the present "religious" divisions appear not so much a sin as an absurdity, the time seems rapidly to have become ripe for initiation of a new experiment of spiritual reconciliation in corporate life. This was urged by all the speakers. The note of power was struck pre-eminently by Mr. J. C. Clynes (that wonderful man much altered and aged since we heard him in 1917), Mr. G. N. Barnes in his masterly presentment of a League of Nations, Mr. W. A. Appleton fresh from his mission to American Labour, the Bishop of Peterborough, Canon Masterman, and Dr. Selbie. The latter's inspired common sense is always refreshing.

The Churchmen's Union, holding its Conference at Girton College, had an interesting meeting in Magdalene Library, presided over by the Dean of Carlisle. It was quite familiar to hear Dr. Rashdall tell the story of the person who described Modern Churchmen as "those are the people who believe nothing." Discussion was invited, but no protest was made against what might sound to some surprising statements of faith, or rather of expression of faith.

Mr. J. A. R. Marriott, M.P., preached on August 4 to an overflowing congregation in St. Edward's Church. The point of view of the able layman, finely and modestly put, was of peculiar interest. By using her men of exceptional mind and soul in this way the Church might go far in solving one of her problems.

One looks wistfully at notebooks bursting with good things. Yet will not all these be written when the University publishes this course of 1918 in full in the early autumn? F. ROBERTS.

THE LATE CAPT. WALTER SHORT.

A BROTHER officer, Capt. Oliphant, who was the last to see the Rev. Walter Short alive, has sent details of his last moments. Wounded in the arm on the morning of July 20 he and others in like case were still fired at and still further wounded by the enemy; and in spite of gallant efforts—one stretcher-bearer tried four times to rescue him—it was impossible to rescue him. "After that," writes Capt. Oliphant, "I passed over the scene with my men, and then saw Capt. Short, who was dying. I stopped and spoke to him and ordered two stretcher-bearers again to tend to his needs, though I knew he was drawing near his end. Kneeling beside him, he looked up and in a faint voice (with a heavenly smile on his handsome face) he said, 'I'm done for, old boy. Give my love to —.' I pressed his hand in a last farewell. The sentence was never finished, but well was the meaning known. No other scene on a battlefield has ever left such an impression, and never have I seen a man die who looked so happy amidst the horrors of war. He crossed the Jordan with a benign smile on his face, and if it be my fate to die in this war I humbly pray that I may meet my Maker in a manner similar to Capt. W. Short."

Capt. Oliphant saw his friend interred, along with other officers and men, in a cornfield near a vineyard, with beautiful woods on two sides and a picturesque French village on another.

The senior chaplain (non-Church of England), the Rev. H. Gerard Price, has also written, and mentions the introduction he had to Capt. Short from the Rev. J. G. Gibson, Wesleyan chaplain, who spoke of the "very high reputation he bore with both officers and men." It is abundantly evident that our late friend was much beloved in the regiment, as by his Church and his numerous friends at home.

MEMORIAL NOTICE.

THE REV. ALEXANDER WEBSTER.

WE record with deep regret the death, on August 16, of the Rev. Alexander Webster, at his home at Aberdeen. He was in his 79th year, and had retired from active service in 1910; but he retained a vivid interest to the last in public affairs, especially literary and religious, and his pen was still busy as in former years. In its excellent obituary notice The Aberdeen Free Press says:—

Mr. Webster was a native of Old Meldrum, but when 10 years of age removed to Airdrie. When quite a young man he took up residence in Glasgow, where he was a devoted Sunday school teacher and an adherent of the Free Church of Scotland. He was urged to study for the ministry of the Free Church, but owing to his religious views did not entertain the suggestion, and soon afterwards he entered the Unitarian ministry. His first settled charge was at Paisley (1872-74), but he was afterwards transferred to Perth (1875-79), and subsequently to Glasgow (South St. Mungo Street, 1879-84), where he began the active political work, with which during the latter part of his life he was more or less associated. He became acquainted with Michael Davitt, and other leaders of Irish Home Rule, and he was chairman of Mr. Henry George's first committee. Later he espoused the cause of Socialism, and was the first delegate sent from Scotland to the meetings of the Social Democratic Federation in London.

His ministry in Aberdeen began in 1884, when he was settled in the Unitarian Church in George Street. He at once threw himself vigorously into political and philanthropic movements. He spoke regularly in the open-air at the Broad Hill Sunday after Sunday for a number of years. He took a large part in the discussion of labour questions, and frequently appeared on public platforms. In 1889 Mr. Webster inaugurated the well-known Children's Fresh-Air Fortnight scheme, which has been productive of so much benefit year in and year out to many children in Aberdeen. A breakdown in health compelled Mr. Webster to seek a more restful sphere, and (in 1891) he accepted a call to the Unitarian Church in Kilmarnock. He remained in Kilmarnock for four years, and in 1895 the congregation in Aberdeen turned again to Mr. Webster, whose health had been fully restored, and in March of the year named he began his second ministry in Aberdeen, which lasted till 1910.

Mr. Webster resumed his addresses on the Broad Hill, and renewed his interest in public work, and his popularity was shown in 1897, when as a candidate for the School Board he was returned at the top of the poll, and after a violent controversy, which is now largely forgotten, became chairman of the Board by a majority of 8 to 6 over the late Prof. Robertson. Three years later he was returned third on the poll, although absent from Aberdeen during the election. Mr. Webster, however, had in view a new Unitarian Church in Aberdeen, and he retired from the School Board in order to devote all his energies to that important project. As the result of his exertions the present excellent suite of buildings at the corner of Skene Street were erected at a cost of £7,000. In September, 1910, as stated above, he retired from his charge owing to failing health, and received many hearty expressions of appreciation of his personal character and public service.

Mr. Webster was a prolific writer of pamphlets and a keen debater. In his farewell sermon in the Unitarian Church he mentioned that he had written and delivered nearly 1,800 sermons; he had conducted 298 open-air meetings and 16 public debates, and he believed that his publications had been more numerous than those of any other Unitarian minister in Scotland. One of his debates, it may be mentioned, took place on two successive nights in October, 1886, with Mr. Lancelot Oliver, and he also carried on a written controversy with the late Dr. Alexander Stewart, in reply to his volume 'Divinity of Christ.' Mr. Webster was a diligent student of Burns, and his publications include 'Burns and the Kirk,' 'The Ideals of Robert Burns,' and 'The Religion of Robert Burns.' He contributed articles on social, economic, and other subjects to many papers and periodicals. He frequently contributed to the columns of The Free Press, and was an exceedingly ready and direct writer. Numerous tales and sketches written by Mr. Webster were published in The Weekly Free Press. His best-known public work—'My Pilgrimage from Calvinism to Unitarianism'—ran into many editions, and his writings on Burns had also a wide constituency. Mr. Webster was courageous and fearless in the expression of his views. At the time of the Boer War he openly spoke against the policy of the Government, with the result that his meetings were broken up amidst scenes of great disorder, and many citizens will recall the disturbances which occurred on a Sunday night in the Trades Hall, which required to be quelled by the calling out of the military. Although Mr. Webster's views on public questions were subjected to much hostile criticism and opposition, his honesty, candour, and straightforwardness were recognised and respected. He occupied for many years a considerable place in the public life of Aberdeen, and his labours, particularly on behalf of education and social reform, well entitled him to the esteem of the community.

It may be added that Mr. Webster, whose whole-hearted devotion and splendid sincerity won the admiration of Unitarians far and wide, was the preacher at the British and Foreign Unitarian Association anniversary in 1907, and a book of his, 'Theology in Scotland: Reviewed by a Heretic,' was published recently by the Lindsey Press and contains an excellent portrait. Twice married he has left a widow, for whom deep sympathy will be felt, and three sons, the eldest being Mr. W. O. Webster, Principal of the Aberdeen Business College.

The funeral took place on Monday, when there was a large attendance. The Rev. H. Dawtreay officiated at the service in the church and at the subsequent interment at Old Meldrum, and in the course of his address spoke of their late friend's conspicuous qualities of originality, zeal, alertness, adaptability, and entire sincerity. He had declared: "On some things I resolved at the outset, and I made the compact with my conscience, that I would speak what I thought, use no phrases however pious or unctuous that did not express my conviction, and always be thorough in my thinking and straightforward in my conduct." Such a man would have been out of place in any but a free pulpit. He never spoke for worldly favour, or for the sake of gaining the approval of a congregation. He regarded himself as an instrument of the truth, charged with its message, endowed with its persuasion. We thank God for his brave life.

A GERMAN LIBERAL.

THE following "note" which we find in The Christian Register will be read with special interest by those among us who have tried to believe that the Kaiser and his like are not the only men of German stock that ever were: "We say it with tenderness and poignancy: Prof. Walter Rauschenbusch of Rochester probably died of a broken heart. The Great War did it. He represented in his birth and breeding that spiritual lineage of Germany which for us is now well-nigh extinct; and just because he was primarily the fruit of true spiritual discipline (which some of us know and lament with keen regret), his eyes could not for their very purity behold or believe the iniquity. Poet in spirit he was to begin with, whose heart found its consonance with the Infinite Harmony; and on the manward quest his whole eager being, with its superb intellectual discipline, went out especially to the innumerable unfavoured ones, who need so much and get so little of help to see God as He is, to enjoy Him in comparative quiet, and to live in economic safety. In order to realise for them this ineffably beautiful estate, what was more natural than that he should seek the social meaning of the gospel of Jesus Christ? He wrote not only the first great book on the social order from the Christian viewpoint, really getting at the teachings, but the greatest book that has been written in that field. If our readers do not know it with gratitude and appreciation, please let them have for their very own 'Christianity and the Social Crisis.' It has influenced more preachers than any book in twenty years. We are familiar with his other notable works, and with his extraordinary gifts as a lecturer. His prayers were incomparable, in our current tongue. He was the sanest, truest, most spiritual interpreter of social questions in America. He never lost his balance, and he never stood still. The present writer sat among cultivated Germans in Berlin, before the war, and they said that of all the men who spoke at the Congress of Religious Liberals in that city in 1910, Prof. Rauschenbusch made the profoundest impression. Nothing in this epoch is harder to bear than the untimely going of such a seer and saint and effectual lover of his kind as Walter Rauschenbusch."

"IGNOTUS" of The Manchester City News in a long and very appreciative article last Saturday, reviewed our friend the Rev. A. W. Fox's new book, 'The Ethics and Theology of the Old Testament.' "I have seldom read," he said, "a theological work with so much satisfaction, even with thankfulness." Considering the fierce onslaught recently made by "Ignotus" on most churches and parsons this is remarkable testimony to Mr. Fox's book, which is described as "a work full of reverence, one which will help a doubter and confute a sceptic." We hope to give an account of this useful volume in an early issue.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Aberdeen.—On Sunday morning the Rev. H. Dawtreay made feeling reference to the death of the Rev. Alexander Webster, former minister of the church, and at the close the congregation adopted a message of sympathy to be sent to Mrs. Webster and her family. It said "This congregation and the cause of religion in Scotland, owe more to Mr. Webster than can be told. He was our loyal friend, and a true father in God to us, and we hold and shall hold him ever in grateful and loving remembrance."

Atherton.—The Rev. J. J. Wright's sermon at Chowbent, August 10, in connection with the regrettable exclusion of the Unitarian congregation from the United Service, August 4, was given in full in the Leigh Chronicle, and is reprinted as a pamphlet with the title 'Prussianism in Religion and Kaiserism in Atherton.' Identifying "Kaiserism" with the disposition to "lord it" over others, Mr. Wright points out that this arrogant spirit is chiefly manifested by High Churchism: "There is only one Church, and the High Church is it!" Such was the assumption, though many good Churchmen, like Bishop Diggle and Bishop Henson denounce the setting up of a "corner in religion" as they describe it. After recounting the recent incidents, as reported in last week's INQUIRER, the preacher expressed his deep regret that they should have happened. In nearly 28 years of his ministry there their congregation had frequently shared in united work and worship with others. "Who or what is at work to poison and divide this good old spirit of Atherton?" he asked, and indicated pretty clearly whence the mischief came; and in conclusion he said:—"Profiteering in wartime is an abomination. Yet I will tell you what is more abominable. It is to take war's deaths, and even people's sorrows, and to exploit them in the interest of a church. Well, we of this chapel will neither exploit nor be exploited; no, nor are we going to be ignored. We are never ignored when money is wanted, we are never ignored when hard work is needed, and we have not been ignored when flesh and blood was required to meet this war. Why have they taken 140 young men from this chapel as fit to fight for them, if these same young men, or their parents and relatives, are not fit, here at home, to pray with them? If Unitarians are to be excluded from 'united' services at home, Unitarians should be exempted from active service at the front. Alas, they can never give us back our dead who have already died for England. But all the thousands of Unitarians now in army and navy ought to be relieved; the motor ambulances and the soldiers' huts for rest and refreshment, which our Unitarian Sunday schools and chapels have provided, ought to be given back to us; the hostels and the hospitals run in Belgium and in France by Unitarians ought to be closed; all the £42,000, in money and goods, which the readers of one Unitarian paper alone have subscribed, ought to be returned to us—if Unitarians are unfit to be included when England prays together for those who are fighting England's battles. It is surely the limit, not only of intolerance, but of insolence, to take our money, to take our goods, to take even our flesh and blood, and then to damn our souls. Of course, the thing is absurd, and we should treat it as an absurdity were it not, in these times, so serious. Think of it. For four years, as a country and a commonwealth, we have been sinking all differences, class and party, creed and colour, unitedly spending millions of money and shedding rivers of blood. For what? To kill, once for all, Prussianism among the nations and Kaiserism among their rulers. And are we in England, after fighting and suffering unitedly to kill these things abroad, are we going now to be divided, and allow, here at home, either Prussianism in religion or Kaiserism in Atherton? If so we shall get what we deserve. But if not, then the officials and members of the Atherton Churches will need to take action immediately. Their eyes have now been opened. They had evidently been hoodwinked into entering a so-called Vigilance Committee, which is dogmatically exclusive. Either the Atherton Free Churches agree with that exclusion or they don't. If they don't, they they can instruct their delegates on the Vigilance Committee to make it entirely inclusive, or withdraw from it. Failing this, some of us, even in war time—but oh, the pity of it—will now have to revive again the Atherton Free Church Union, which for many years so vigorously kept the State clergy in Atherton within decent bounds. Like war, this may now be laid upon us in Atherton as a moral and spiritual necessity. And I know many in Atherton who will rise to it."

Framlingham and Bedford.—On Sunday, August 11, our two Sunday Schools met at Bedford for united Anniversary Services, when there were good attendances both afternoon and evening, friends from the Framlingham congregation helping with their presence. The children sang well, and three of the scholars recited the afternoon Bible lessons. We are deeply indebted to the Rev. J. Arthur Pearson (who with Mrs. and Miss Pearson, is staying in the neighbourhood), for the afternoon's address, and for his further kindly help in conducting the evening service. His sermon in the evening, and also the talk to the children in the afternoon, were greatly appreciated and will be long remembered. On the following day, August 12th, the scholars again united for their Annual Treat, which this year took place at Framlingham. After a pleasant, happy day, a short devotional service was held in the Old Meeting House, at which Mr. Pearson again assisted.

Great Hucklow Holiday Home. A legacy of £20 has been paid to the Great Hucklow Holiday Home under the will of the late Mrs. Moss of Gee Cross, Hyde.

Newport (I.W.).—The Rev. Randall Jones, of Pendleton, who has been staying in the Isle of Wight, has occupied the pulpit for the three Sundays. On August 11 the Sunday School Anniversary Services were held. Powerful sermons were preached to large congregations, and the collections more than doubled that of previous years. On August 15 the Sunday School Outing took place at Sandown. Favoured with brilliant weather the children enjoyed themselves on the sands. A bountiful tea was provided, 105 parents and scholars sat down. Mr. and Mrs. L. Chatfield Clarke and Miss Eveleigh accompanied the Party, and the Rev. R. Jones cycled from Niton to meet us at Sandown.

Newton Abbot.—On Saturday afternoon, August 4, a United Service of Prayer and Thanksgiving, arranged by the ministers of the town, was held in the Courtenay Park, and attended by a large number of the townspeople. The service was conducted by the rector and three of the Nonconformist pastors; the local band of the Salvation Army accompanied the singing of the hymns, one of which, suggested by the Unitarian minister (Rev. F. Allen), was Dr. R. J. Wrexford's 'Lord, while for all mankind we pray.' A collection was made for the Newton Abbot Hospital, the service concluding with the National Anthem.

Portsmouth: St. Thomas Street.—The Eightieth birthday of the Rev. T. Bond, pastor of the General Baptist Church, was celebrated by a "floral tea," arranged by the ladies of the sewing circle. Among the tokens of affectionate esteem were bouquets presented to Mr. and Mrs. Bond by Master Harold and Miss Betty Levette and Miss Joan Murch. Mr. E. Pervin, on behalf of the ladies, congratulated their minister and wished him many happy returns of the day, and Mr. Bond made a feeling response.

Rochdale.—As briefly reported last week, the Centennial Meetings proved a great success in every way. There were large attendances on Saturday evening and on Sunday. At the Conversation on Saturday evening the Chairman, Mr. Walter Scott (Treasurer of the Church and of the Centenary Fund), struck the right note in his very admirable opening address in which he offered his greeting to all assembled, indicated the aims of the Centenary Committee, spoke from his long and prominent connection with Clover Street Chapel, the Day School and the Sunday School, and expressed his conviction that at no time had the various institutions been in a more flourishing state than they were to-day, and that therefore the outlook for the future was full of promise. The other speakers caught his enthusiasm, dwelt upon their happy association with Clover Street, re-called the achievements of the past, and urged the present workers to endeavour to make the future more glorious still. These addressed the meeting in the following order: Mr. Frederick Horstall, Miss Smithies, Miss Elliott (daughter of the late Rev. T. R. Elliott and of Mrs. Elliott, who also was present), Mr. Wright Wilcock, and the Rev. T. P. Spedding. The Sunday services were made perfectly appropriate throughout. As was expected in the August "Messenger," it was a disappointment to all that the two former ministers of Clover Street Chapel, Alderman James Briggs, of Crews, and the Rev. J. Crowther Hirst, of Gateacre, were unable on account of their health to be present and take part in the arrangements, especially on the Sunday: Mr. Evans took the morning service, and the Rev. T. P. Spedding, who received an affectionate welcome on all hands, took the afternoon and evening services as well as the Communion Service. After the Communion service opportunity was taken to express the sympathy felt for Mrs. Spedding and himself and their son in the bereavement that has recently befallen them, and to convey to them the best of wishes for a happy settlement at Mansfield, where Mr. Spedding takes up the regular ministry again, in October.

West Bromwich.—The Annual General Meeting of the Congregational Society was held on Wednesday last, Mr. J. J. Bowater in the chair in place of Mr. E. Jackson, President, who was unavoidably absent. The Secretary's report recorded a year of strenuous work, and the Treasurer's statement of accounts showed that the Society was in a position to hand over to the Church Treasurer a substantial cheque, considerably larger in amount than that of any previous year. Most of the institutions controlled by the Congregational Society are in a vigorous condition, notwithstanding the fact that all the young men of the congregation are serving with His Majesty's forces. Our Church has suffered very much during the last four years through the decrease of subscribers—the financial loss amounting to more than 40%—and through the absence of our young men, but many of the existing members have materially increased their subscriptions, and several new subscribers have lately been secured, and we look forward to better times with the conclusion of the Great War and the return of our boys. The Pastor has formed a troop of Boy Scouts, whose existence and enthusiasm were lately demonstrated by the turning-out and thorough cleaning of the large schoolroom, stage, &c.—an act thoroughly in keeping with the scout spirit.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

All letters and manuscripts or the Editor should be sent to 13 Bream's Buildings, Fetter Lane, London, E.C.4. They must reach the Editor not later than Wednesday morning for publication the same week.

THE great change which has taken place in the aspect of the western front during the past six weeks is all the more gratifying, we maintain, in view of its gradual character. Unlike the series of overwhelming attacks made by the Germans, from the great offensive in March to the crossing of the Marne, the military pressure of the Allies has been on the whole steady and sustained, even if so cautious and apparently tentative at times as to beget some degree of doubt whether it could lead to important, not to say decisive, results. The end of the struggle is not yet reached, but enough has been done by now to reassure the least optimistic. We may surely take breath with more confidence than at any time since the rude shaking we (and our Parliamentary prophets) received five months ago, when in spite of long enough forewarning our lines were smashed through with such disastrous effect. Looking back, we have abundant cause to be thankful that our own armies in particular, though the others, and notably the French, rank in this respect with them, stood fast in the hour of worst peril, and saved the Great Cause from a defeat, which though we could never have acquiesced in it would have been an immediate world catastrophe. There is much yet to do and to bear, but we may gratefully believe the tide has definitely turned.

THE German Colonial Minister, Dr. Solf, made a sufficiently dexterous statement of his country's case last week, and had it not come as a sequel to other and very different representations by men of equal authority or greater, many of us would have been more favourably impressed. Unfortunately, we cannot erase from the record the things done as well as the things said, by which the German mind and policy have been revealed; and the time is really too short for us not to remember how the dominant military party have secured the downfall of one speaker after another who has voiced anything like moderate ambitions. Lord Robert Cecil suggests that there is a big "if" about Dr. Solf's reputed expressions; but taking them as authentic he has pointed to some decided steps in advance of prior statements. Among these is the declaration that Belgium is to be set up in absolute independence again, which is something. As to the question of the German colonies, Lord Robert reaffirms the Premier's assurance that this is a matter to be settled, not by any present occupying Power or Powers, but by the conference that deals with the terms of peace.

WE take occasion also to note what Lord Robert Cecil, whose personal ability and character no less than his official status add weight to his words, has said about the League of Nations. Incidentally, having been asked by the Dean of Christ Church, Oxford, to state his view of the policy advocated by Lord Lansdowne and his friends, he says he is persuaded, while a "vehement" advocate of peace—the epithet recalls Mr. Balfour's recent use of it in regard to his support of the proposition of a League of Nations—that German militarism must be made to recognise plainly its failure as a policy. "Moloch must be humiliated in the sight of all his votaries, if they are to accept a purer faith." Thus, like most of his countrymen, Lord Robert, while intensely desiring a pacific world, can see no prospect of attaining it while the bullying element in Europe is left untamed.

As to the League, Lord Robert says: "This, every hater of war—and who does not hate war?—must heartily support. Yet we must not be blind to the extent and difficulty of the change we desire. The diplomatic and political machinery is the smallest part of the task. All nations need a conversion of heart before the League can realise our hopes and make an end of war. To think of the League of Nations merely as a diplomatic structure because it must begin by a diplomatic instrument is like thinking of baptism as a hydropathic treatment because it is administered by immersion or affusion. In both it is the inward change that is the essence....To make an end of war, nothing less is requisite than a shifting of the centre of human allegiance from nationality to something wider. We need to feel a supernational patriotism. Such a change as this cannot be effected by the experience of war, however terrible, or by any treaty however solemn. It must be the work of moral and religious influence, and probably of a long period of time." This reflection must come home to all thoughtful persons, and it reinforces our plea for assiduous devotion to the creation of a right spirit, as well as a right understanding, on the subject.

WHEN we invited our readers last week to bombard our Belgian Fund with their cheques before the stamp tax doubled, we did not anticipate the imminent arrival of a special appeal from Mr. Drummond. As will be seen in another column he is throwing his full energy, as usual, into the task in hand; and we shall have much pleasure in being the channel between generous donors and himself, so that the very necessary work he speaks of may be promptly undertaken. If such donors cannot get their cheques written before the new tax is in force—well, they may like to inaugurate the twopenny régime by a special adventure into this most admirable form of helping to win the war. And, even then, the Belgian Fund will not, we are sure, lose their practical sympathy and support.

THOSE of our ministers and other friends who attended the Boston Congress eleven years ago will recall with warm gratitude the boundless generosity of hosts and hostesses towards Unitarians from the Old Country. The flowing thousands of young soldiers now temporarily with us on their way from the United States to the battlefields of France afford an opportunity, nay, impose a duty, which must not be neglected. A strong plea has been published and is urgently supported by men and women who are or have been visiting the States, especially for the purpose of enlisting sympathy for the cause of the Allies, that all possible courtesy and hospitality should be shown to these men, now thousands of miles away from home. The British soldier, even if "leave" is at long intervals, does get his glance at home and home folk now and again, and is always able to communicate in a few days by means of our wonderful postal service. Not so these Americans, whose yearnings must be intense at times; and what theirs are like who have sent them forth to fight side by side with our own sons we need not be told. It should be a delight to have any share in brightening the world for both by such services as we can render.

DOUBTLESS the conditions will much hamper the carrying out of organised hospitality, but in some of the larger centres it ought to be possible to arrange more than casual attentions. When in connection with the visit of the United States delegates to the Berlin Congress Liverpool and London gave feasts of welcome there were young men among the hosts upon whose help in this genial work we cannot now rely; they are in khaki or blue, some are gone into captivity, some are sadly maimed, some are beyond these voices. For the sake of those who are absent, as well as for the sheer happiness of the thing, those of us who are carrying on ought surely to do something really worth while. The Americans have profited by our experience, in addition to their own fine business faculty, and we believe we might get much assistance from their officials in tracking out and gathering the Unitarians together from time to time. We should all be glad to welcome them to our own homes; but that is a food and servant difficulty not easy to surmount. But let us try what we can do. We shall welcome suggestions from our readers.

THERE are in India to-day several preachers and teachers connected with the Brahmo Samaj who had the privilege of studying at Manchester College while the late Dr. Drummond was Principal. It is gratifying to learn that the Theists of India are not forgetful of their indebtedness to him. The Indian Messenger says: "The death of Dr. James Drummond, late Principal of Manchester College, Oxford, removes a notable exponent of liberal religion. He was not only a great scholar but also, what is rarer, a veritable saint. His long life was devoted to the pursuit of religion and knowledge in a spirit of absolute self-forgetfulness. Meek, gentle, unwavering, profoundly devout, he lived like an ancient Indian rishi in the English society of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries.... Dr. Drummond's life proved that even in this age of industrial civilisation the noblest type of piety and devotion was not unattainable. Liberal religion all the world over is poorer by the death of this high-souled man, who was a real disciple of Christ in truth and in spirit."

MAKING GOOD.

WE do not suppose that when certain wretches planned this war they had in view more than the main results, as they hoped them to be. The Kaiser, it is true, has long since been credited with disavowing responsibility—he did not plan this war! But whether he or others let loose the avalanche, the course it has taken illustrates that strange intermingling of the evil and the good which marks all human experience. Many a bye-product which was assuredly far from entering the war party's field of vision has emerged and established itself, with quite unbounded potentiality for the future of human society. Instances will readily occur to mind—the closer organisation of industry and supply, the employment of women, the extended cultivation of the soil, the conquest of the air as a means of transit, these are some of them. Less imposing but no less important, perhaps, is the emergence of a new hope for those who a short time ago were the despair of themselves and of all but those grace endowed spirits who have learned from the Gospel to "despair of no man."

It is into the personal, rather than the general aspects of human life, that we find ourselves led by the stories given us, on the most indisputable authority, of men in the Forces who have, as the phrase goes, "made good." A year or two ago they were simply, but appallingly, set aside from the ordinary run of men; they belonged, we said, to "the criminal classes." The term is at once a record of individual and of social failure. The man, for whatever reasons, has failed to behave himself according to the moral—or shall we say the legal—standard of respectable citizenship, and in particular to "earn an honest living." Society, meaning the rest of us, who presumably have not failed that way, has unmistakably failed in dealing creditably with its criminals—unless, indeed, there is something to be proud of in shutting up specimens of our race in bare, hateful cells, putting them into degrading clothes, and setting them to servile tasks. If we were all compelled to a season of "war-work" (let us say) as warders in one or other of His Majesty's prisons—we will not suggest our undergoing experimentally a few weeks' confinement there—we should probably be shaken considerably out of our sleepy acceptance of these things as unpleasant necessities of civilised life.

They are not necessities. That is the conclusion to which this war, amongst its other teachings, is forcibly directing our attention. We should be fools and blind to miss the lesson. Scotland Yard is not usually regarded as a benevolent institution, though some of us know how sincerely and wisely some police agents, at any rate, deal with their unhappy human problems. But at this moment it can take you into its library, where the tabulated masses of biography are rarely lifted out of sordid dreariness by the touch of romance, and it can point to names that have suddenly brightened into respectability, merit, even into fame. Taken into the army, fed, trained, disciplined, given "a chance," the former prison-birds have not only equalled their comrades but in not a few cases surpassed them. It needs little imagination to understand how a man who has been down in the gutter, who has long lost everybody's respect, his own included, would snatch at this opportunity of recovering himself.

Now, it may be justly remarked that after all it is only an exceptional man, here or there, who has thus won the M.M. or the D.C.M., still more rare, though some have done it, we believe, has been the achieving of the V.C. And if the critic is disposed to be cynical he may suggest that the reduction of the criminal population at home is due to compulsion into military service. Very possibly so; but even then the point arises whether, seeing that military organisation can do so much, civil and industrial organisation might not do equally well. However, not all the population is in the Forces, and amongst those who are left out we suppose would be found a considerable number of those physical and mental degenerates whom we have learnt to regard as the chief recruiting ground of criminals. And the fact that stares us in the face is that 20 out of 69 prisons have been closed since the war began, and the number of inmates of county goals has fallen to less than a sixth of what it was. Sir Evelyn Ruggles-Brise, the Chairman of the Prisons Commission, who has expert knowledge here ranging over many years, finds the causes of this change, as gratifying as it is startling, in two chief directions. In the first place, practically every one can get employment; in the second, there is less facility for drinking. Hence one would infer that if we desire the rank and file of quondam criminals to "make good," not as brilliant fighters but simply as honest workers, society must see to it that, not only during war but also in peace, there shall be employment in plenty and not so much drink.

But Sir Evelyn has something else to say as to this reduction of crime in our land. He tells us that it has been going on since long before the war, and that, whatever may be credited to war-time measures, it is largely due to the more intelligent treatment of young offenders which has obtained of late. Twenty years ago nearly twenty thousand young people were convicted per annum; the total now is but a fifth of that number. The better methods include the operations of the After-Care Societies, who claim to have prevented from 70 to 80 per cent of those young offenders who have come under their attention from sinking into habitual crime. It would appear from this and other indications that, bad as things are, they are growing better. Society itself is at last on the way to "make good," an achievement more meritorious than many ribbons and stars, and one which, of all people, we Unitarians, with our vision of the divine element in every soul of man are most deeply concerned.

THE FUNDAMENTAL PRINCIPLE OF SOCIAL RECONSTRUCTION

THE way in which we treat our fellowmen and ourselves will depend upon what is our view of Personality, its origin, its nature, and its destiny. The Christian conception of Personality is, I hold, the only sure basis of effectual and abiding social reform. It is the foundation of all true democracy and of all consecrated life. Let us endeavour to get a firmer grip of this fundamental principle which, if realised, would transform the world and the life of every one of us, and bring us nearer to the image of Him in Whose likeness we were created, Whose image we so often destroy.

Christian teaching is plain. I find here, as I find nowhere else, the profoundest respect and reverence for the sacredness and eternal value of every individual soul. We are all children of one same equal Father: we are all brothers and sisters before Him. It matters not whether we be rich or poor, wise or ignorant, civilised or savage, healthy or diseased, sane or mad, saint or sinner, white or black, red, brown, or yellow, English or German—we all came from God, we all share the same essential nature, and we shall all, I believe, in the long run, when we have been purged and purified and glorified, go back to God who is our home, and share together the same destinies in that "imperial palace whence we come." What concerns Christianity is our souls, and one man's soul is as precious as any. "There is," writes Walt Whitman, "in respect of the absolute soul, in the possession of such by each single individual, something so transcendent, so incapable of gradations, that, to that extent, it places all beings on a common level, utterly regardless of the distinctions of intellect, virtue, station, or any height or lowliness whatever." In the world we are somebodies or nobodies, influential or negligible, learned or ignorant, rich or in poverty; there are all sorts of differences among us—high society and low society, West Ends and East Ends; some are fed on dainties and some on the meanest fare; some have every advantage life can offer and some have no advantages whatsoever. In the sight of God we are all equally sacred. This is at the heart of Christianity and constitutes its uniqueness and preciousness.

It is necessary, however, to offset what has been said by another no less important consideration. Teach the perfectibility and essential divinity of man how we will, we shall gravely and fearfully and fatally err if we leave out of account the other side of the picture, the inclinations and impulses and urges driving him and forcing him to sin, the fact that he has a lower as well as a higher nature, and that there is scarcely any bottom to the pit into which that lower nature may plunge and precipitate him, if he allow these inclinations and impulses and urges to obtain entire mastery over him. Though we have issued from the slime, the tug of the slime is often pulling at us, we have a whole animal ancestry to our lineage, and the conflict between our lower and our higher nature is often a battle to the death, from which the grace of God can alone deliver us. We must not forget what an agonising struggle is frequently demanded of poor frail human beings when they have been once subjugated by their passions, to extricate themselves from the swamps in which they flounder and too often perish. Let us teach the divinity of man to the utmost, but let us never forget the horror of sin, the havoc it works not only on the sinner but on the sinner's nearest and dearest, and on the hapless victims of his lust and crime. We must ever beware lest we underestimate man's frailty, lest we give him an overweening pride and confidence in himself. We must still teach him humility, his utter and extreme need of divine help if the higher in him is ultimately to triumph over the lower. We must never forget the precipices which dip sheer and lie yawning along his path. It will not do to give a Caliban absolute freedom if we have any care at all for Miranda. We are confronted at one and the same time by both the dignity and the frailty of man, and we shall err in our reckonings if we leave either of these factors out of account. There is God in man, but He is always in man, and His revealing is conditioned by man's frailties and imperfections no less than by his sublimities and perfections. There are two sides to us which we may call the earthly and the heavenly. Both claim their due. But there is this difference between them. What is essential in us is the heavenly: what is earthly in us is only temporary, has its importance, its extreme importance even, for our earthly life, yet is only of real and abiding value in so far as it prepares and fits us for that heavenly life which is our home and native air where our inmost being all the time belongs.

What a difference it would make if in our dealings with our fellow-men we always regarded all men and women as being essentially of divine origin, and as having immortal souls and eternal destinies! Should we then grind men down body and soul under the ruthless wheels of industry? Should we ever regard them as mere cogs in the industrial machine? Should we ever slight any one, much less degrade any one? There would be no more sweating, no more overwork and under-pay, no more poverty, no more bad housing, no more inhumanity of man to man, no more war. And if we could all take up this attitude towards ourselves there would be no more sin, no more drunkenness, no more lying, no more bestiality; we should feel that we are indeed the temple of God, and we should dread to defile the temple in which He dwells. This is Christianity, and, to my understanding, no other religion approaches it in insight and penetration, and in conveying just this same profound respect for each man's and each woman's soul, or inmost part of them.

Let us now cast the searchlight of this fundamental and revealing Christian principle upon the world and society as we know them to-day. In the light of this fundamental Christian principle man has a right to a reasonable standard of life such as befits a spiritual being and not a beast of burden, which is kept fit merely for the material profit of man. A man is neither a horse nor a machine, and wages should be more than an item in the cost of production. The end of industrial and commercial organisation should be not merely increased production but human welfare. Yet, before the war, "Out of the eight to eight-and-a-half million adult workmen in the United Kingdom, it is doubtful if there were one million who were receiving what is really a living wage" (Ryan).

In the light of our fundamental Christian principle man has a right to a decent house and home adapted to the highest interests of a good and happy family life. Before the war, housing conditions were bad enough. They are far worse now. In 1901 about 8 per cent of the population were living in conditions of definite over-crowding, over half a million in one-roomed tenements. The cottages in nearly half the villages were unsatisfactory; in over one-fourth of them there were not enough cottages of any kind. It would be a reasonable estimate to compute that one million additional houses are needed in the United Kingdom in order to make housing conditions really satisfactory.

In the light of our fundamental Christian principle what about sweated industries?

The Daily News held a Sweated Industries Exhibition in 1906. It revealed the fact that 22 industries (out of the 197 for which statistics are given) had the monstrous average working-day of 15 to 16 hours, that 80 worked for more than 12 hours a day, and that not less than 184 worked for 10 hours a day or more. This was three years before the passing of the Trade Boards Act, which in 1913 affected 13 industries. Laundries are still, however, allowed to work women for as much as 14 hours in any one day, and in times of pressure these hours are often terribly exceeded. Waitresses, before the war, often had to work for 70 to 96 hours a week. Railway porters are sometimes on duty 16 hours a day. Omnibus conductors in 1910 were working on an average 15 hours a day, and usually for 13 days a fortnight. And so on.

These are some of the grosser facts. I could go on under different heads with the same tale of this general brutal disregard throughout society of the elementary rights of every human being.

I would like, however, to end on a higher note. The words are those of a great leader of the Church now dead: "No man may with impunity outrage that human dignity which God Himself treats with reverence, nor stand in the way of that higher life which is the preparation for the eternal life of Heaven. Nay more; no man has in this matter power over himself. To consent to any treatment which is calculated to defeat the end and purpose of his being is beyond his right; he cannot give up his soul to servitude; for it is not man's own rights which are here in question, but the rights of God."

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE LATE

REV. ALEXANDER WEBSTER.

The Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—It is not for me to offer my tribute of deep admiration of the late Rev. Alexander Webster to your columns, but there is one incident in his life which is of interest and is not, I think, generally known, which I venture to submit. When, early in his career, Mr. Webster was in Glasgow, the Rev. Philip Wicksteed went there to give lectures on the Old Testament and the Higher Criticism, and met Mr. Webster. The latter introduced to him Henry George's 'Progress and Poverty' and Mr. Wicksteed read it in the train back to the south. It "set his brain on fire": he felt sure that George was wrong, and resolved to study economics to be able to refute him. This study he pursued with members of the fellowship which afterwards became the Fabian Society—but they were then Marxists. They challenged Mr. Wicksteed to write an article for a certain magazine, confuting Marx. Mr. Wicksteed accepted—and converted his fellows. This incident in the life of Mr. Webster I had from himself.—

Yours, &c. R. F. RATTRAY.

Dr. Robert Lyons, who was intimately associated with the Rev. Alexander Webster during the last years of his ministry, and was the chairman of his church committee for some years before he resigned, sends us a sympathetic appreciation of one whom he regarded as an honoured and beloved friend. We append the following passages:—

"Mr. Webster's chief characteristics were his intense love of justice, his broad-mindedness, and his high moral courage. These qualities were displayed in many fields—political, social, and economic. He was endowed with the rare courage of advocating a cause when convinced of its justice, even when that cause was scornfully denounced by politicians and their unthinking, blindly-obedient followers. He possessed in large measure that bravery of soul. His was not the nature to seek safety by shouting with the majority. He had the strength to stand alone. It was often his fate to do so, as it is that of all pioneers. He was never fettered by the slavery of the herd instinct. He had a keen eye and a healthy contempt for the cant of conformity, for the tyranny of custom, for the moral and intellectual death so often associated with conventional respectability.

"Mr. Webster's wisdom as a pioneer was indicated by his strenuous labours for the furtherance and freedom of education, for he knew that it is only by real education that mankind can progress. On this was based his passion for the welfare of children. In the struggle for the emancipation of women he was a fearless worker, and here he and I were linked together in closest sympathy. Another bond between us—we had many—consisted in our love of Ireland, her history, humour, pathos, beauty and people. As an Irishman my heart warmed with pleasure and pride when listening to his sympathetic and informed advocacy of the claims of Ireland for justice and freedom. But I only mention this as an example of Mr. Webster's large-mindedness and his freedom from ignorant insular prejudice, for this great Scotsman had a sympathy that was world-embracing and a burning desire to include all mankind in a great Brotherhood based on co-operation and justice. He was and remained to the end a genuine Internationalist. He loved with a special warmth his own beautiful country; but his love for his fellow-men had no frontiers. Of him it can be truly said that he did not live for self alone. During many years he laboured strenuously, spending his strength unselfishly so that others might reap where he had sown. There in the quiet graveyard at Old Meldrum, near the purple hills he loved so well, we assembled for the last rites and ceremonies, in full confidence that the Great Father of us all had received him with the welcoming words,—Well done, thou good and faithful servant; enter thou into thy rest, into the joys, the glories, the wonders of thy Eternal Home."

MR. DRUMMOND'S "HUTS FUND."

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—I am afraid that I have earned a reputation with the readers of THE INQUIRER of being a bold beggar. But a reputation once earned it becomes a virtue to live up to it. Accordingly, I shall make no apology for pursuing my spendthrift course and asking for what I want. There are still countless generous hearts at home eager to help our men, and I believe really grateful for opportunities of giving where they know that their money is required. I have described already the big cluster of huts where I have the happy privilege of serving at present. It has grown with the need and is now one of the biggest institutes for our men to be found in France. It teems with life. Men are really happy here. We are continually made to feel, as they leave us to go up the line, that it has been a real bit of home to them. But expansion has meant that the arrangements which were adequate three and a half years ago are now quite unsuitable. Moreover, time and weather and the ceaseless pressure of crowds cause serious dilapidations. The consequence is that it has become a matter of urgent necessity to reconstruct part of our equipment before the winter sets in. The boiler house and the kitchen are far too small and no longer weather-proof. The store and yard must also be planned anew, and the simple rooms occupied by the workers are cramped and unsuitable for a staff of seven or eight. There is no comfort of any kind for our lady-workers. It is the last thing that they would think of for themselves, but I feel that something must be done at once to guard them from unnecessary exposure and physical strain. No words of mine could describe what they have done for our men in this place. Two of them have been here for more than three years, and all are here not as birds of passage but to spend and be spent to the limit of their strength for the duration of the war. Plans for all this most necessary work are in hand. The price of labour and material is very high and I reckon that we shall need about £500 for this absolutely necessary work. I should esteem it a very gracious and generous act on the part of the readers of THE INQUIRER, with whom I have had such pleasant relations in the past, if they would give the whole or part of this sum. I cannot think of any better way of helping our fighting men or of showing goodwill towards those who are trying to be their friends.

By the courtesy of the acting-editor, the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, contributions may be sent to him at 13 Bream's Buildings, London, E.C.4, and will be acknowledged in the columns of THE INQUIRER. May I add that the money contributed recently for our central Y.M.C.A. library and for various purposes connected with this Hut has been most useful. The piano generously given by Mr. Ronald Jones was used for the first time at a concert last Saturday and has given great pleasure. Should there be any balance over in connection with this new appeal, it can be used for our Christmas fund, an object which our lady workers have very much at heart. Even in this grilling August weather it is necessary to begin to think about Christmas, if it is to be a joyous festival for the men as it has always been in this Hut hitherto.—Yours, &c.,

COLONEL BULLOCK AND CHRISTIAN SCIENCE.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—Lieut.-Colonel Bullock is reported, in your issue of the 17th inst., to have said, in his lecture on atheism at Mill Hill, Leeds, that atheism was the source of Christian Science. Now atheism is defined as disbelief in, or denial of, the existence of God. Christian Science, on the other hand, declares that God is All-in-all. How the latter teaching can be derived from the former, it would be difficult for any sane logical person to find out. It is but one more example of the hopeless tangles that people get into while attempting to criticise that of which they have no knowledge.

Our critic further said that Christian Science teaches that there is nothing but God in the world, and that therefore there could be no pain, because pain was not good. Such teaching, he says, "is contrary to human experience and is simply juggling with facts." Christian Science teaches that the universe of God's creating is spiritual, and not material. In referring to the material sense of the world, St. John says: "Love not the world, neither the things that are in the world. For all that is in the world, the lust of the flesh, and the lust of the eyes, and the pride of life, is not of the Father, but is of the world. And the world passeth away, and the lust thereof: but he that doeth the will of God abideth for ever." From this it is quite evident that the world, as it appears to the five physical senses, is not the outcome of Spirit. Mrs. Eddy, writing on page 209 of 'Science and Health, with Key to the Scriptures,' throws great light on this subject. She says: "The compounded minerals or aggregated substances composing the earth, the relations which constituent masses hold to each other, the magnitudes, distances, and revolutions of the celestial bodies, are of no real importance, when we remember that they all must give place to the spiritual fact by the translation of man and the universe back into Spirit. In proportion as this is done, man and the universe will be found harmonious and eternal."—Yours, &c.

JOHN POUNDS' HOUSE.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—Will you give me leave to acknowledge with thanks the following donations received by the Unitarian Historical Society towards the restoration, for which they have made themselves responsible, of John Pounds' House at Portsmouth:—

Already acknowledged	6	7	6
Mrs. E. Brown	1	1	0
Miss Mary L. Bruce	1	0	0
Mr. B. Hingley	1	1	0
Miss Leigh-Smith	5	0	0
Mrs. Arnold Lupton	0	10	6
Mr. John Sale	1	0	0
	£16	10	0

The work has now been put in hand; and upon removing the decayed woodwork it has been found that more woodwork was decayed than was thought to be the case. The result of this is that the cost of the repairs will slightly exceed £24, and an appeal is made for further donations to cover this amount. A block for use in the Transactions of the Society is being made from the sketch of John Pounds' House kindly presented by Mr. Chappell; and it is proposed to strike off a few copies and to send one to each donor.—Yours, &c.,

DUNDEE, THE FREE RELIGIOUS MOVEMENT.

Forty years ago people in Scotland were growing sceptical concerning the orthodox presentations of life after death. The doctrine of eternal punishment was rejected, and amongst religious leaders there were those who urged its deletion from doctrinal standards. But the penalty for such action was severe. For his stand on this point the Rev. David Macrae was, by the Supreme Court of the United Presbyterian Church, solemnly deposed from his status as minister. This was in 1879. Mr. Macrae had at the time received a call from School Wynd Church, Dundee, but being thus expelled from the ministry he was no longer acceptable to the Presbytery. The congregation of School Wynd, however, had been inspired by their late revered pastor, the Rev. George Gilfillan, with a deep respect for freedom of thought, and a portion of them resolved that the reformer should not be silenced. They left their church, and Mr. Macrae began his ministry, not in School Wynd Church, but amongst those who had come out, a homeless people meeting in a hired hall. The largest hall in the city was engaged, and there the people flocked to hear the bold preacher who had dared to denounce the Confession of Faith. Mr. Macrae's ministry prospered, and after seven years of strenuous labour a handsome building was erected, which, in honour of the Rev. George Gilfillan, was named the Gilfillan Memorial Church; and here Mr. Macrae continued his good work until 1897, when declining health compelled him to retire. His successor, the Rev. Walter Walsh, continued the traditions of the church, ever urging the need for freedom of thought. But in course of time, theological interest having shifted from eternal punishment to the New Theology, the day came when to some minds the name "Christian" was a stumbling-block. The Gilfillan Memorial Church was described in its constitution as a "Christian church for the promotion of goodness and truth"; and, regarding this as a limitation, an effort was made in 1911 to alter the name to The Church of To-day. Unhappily this caused a cleavage in the church, and led to a lawsuit, the final outcome of which was a permanent division, one section breaking away and forming what is now known as the Free Religious Movement. Since then, under the leadership of the Rev. Henry Dawtrey, these lovers of truth and freedom have worshipped, as did their fathers forty years ago, in a hired hall; but they are not now concerned about the Confession of Faith, nor about the New Theology, so much as about cherishing a high ideal of life. In one of their monthly magazines their attitude is thus given: "We stand for that which is the supreme need of modern times—the cultivation of the inner life that is in every man, of that living and spiritual religion by the neglect of which, in our days, there has followed widespread degeneration in the character of men." The members of the movement give their leader freedom to proclaim the truth as it is revealed to him; for out of strife and suffering has come the recognition that all sincere aspiration is worthy of respect, and that only by loyalty to the light within can spiritual progress be made.

From instinctive rejection of the idea of a vindictive and unforgiving Creator, through the mazes of the New Theology, to the vision of a world regenerated by righteousness—such is the path along which these free religious travellers have come. Truly a dark and stormy way, yet well worth the struggle, for theirs is the religion of the future, the practical religion for which the world is waiting.

H. J. D.

A "Y" WORKER'S STORY.

THE Rev. F. J. Gauld, till recently Unitarian minister at Toledo, Ohio, and a visitor to the British and Foreign Unitarian Association meetings a few years ago, tells the readers of The Christian Register some of his experiences and observations as a Y.M.C.A. worker in France, and we quote the following for readers on this side. It refers to the period of the latest German offensive:—

At six o'clock I went to a neighbouring village, where I found my effects dumped on the roadside. This place was heavily shelled all the morning to prevent troop and convoy movements. I remained there during the morning to await developments and find what to do with our goods. In the meantime a stream of wounded Tommies poured through the town toward the rear. A few of us were able to pass out drinks and cigarettes to cheer them on the way. I confess I should like to have been in a quieter spot, but when I suggested to several Tommies near me that we might seek an abri, one remarked that the ground was quite soft near us and the shells would sink without doing injury. So I had to appear as phlegmatic as they were and sit and watch the shells drop about us, throwing up geysers of dirt higher than the highest trees.

I went to the centre of the town on an errand when shells falling on the roads and houses close by scattered their éclats and debris uncomfortably near. Seeking a cellar abri I found a number of women and crying children. I had a piece of chocolate in my pocket, which I broke into fragments and gave to the children, helping them to forget their fears of the shells. About noon the troops began to pass through the village to the rear. All the front lines were taken by the Germans, and the English were evacuating. The people began to evacuate the near-by towns, and the stream of refugees, which grew worse day by day for a week, filled all the roads, mingling with the convoys of wounded and the impediments of an army in motion. I have never seen anything so sad in this terrible war as these homeless people, very old and very young, fleeing from the enemy, going they knew not where. Sometimes one saw well-to-do farmers driving loaded wagons with household goods and livestock; more often men and women trudging in the heat and dust, carrying all their possessions on their backs, or pushing hand-carts, wheelbarrows, or baby-carriages. Among the little treasures of the lost homes one saw women and children carrying birds or cats and dogs, precious souvenirs of the happier days.

This stream of dispossessed people, their losses and burdens and sorrows, filled the heart with grief. Again and again I thought, If only America could see the suffering brought on this fair land by the greed and lust of the Kaiser's hordes, every man, woman, and child in my free land would rise in unison and dedicate themselves body and soul to the destruction of the power which is bringing this misery on the world.

The enemy had begun his offensive in beautiful weather, with a full moon. While this circumstance may have favoured his plans, it also favoured the refugees and the wounded. In a large base hospital, which had to be evacuated later on account of the bombardment, there was not sufficient room for the wounded, who were placed on the street. In this and another hospital I joined with Y.M.C.A. men in offering what help we could. It was a great relief to be doing something, however inadequate, to satisfy all the need.

The peasants were cultivating their fields and vineyards up to the very last minute, often going about their work while shells were passing overhead. I have seen no real panic spirit in France. The people are admirable. No wonder their sons are the incomparable soldiers who have won the admiration of all the civilised world. It is a privilege to work with them.

At the close of this offensive the American soldier appeared on the scene, and proved his valour and efficiency by holding and repulsing the enemy, with the captures of terrain and prisoners. This success has given renewed courage and hope to the French, who understand the greatness of the promise of America. This last week I have visited a British base hospital where my boy is undergoing treatment. Next to the pleasure of meeting him and knowing that he was rapidly regaining his strength was the pleasure I felt in seeing thousands of splendid American troops who had recently arrived, and in knowing that they are now pouring into France in a constantly augmented flood. This is the finest augury for victory in the future and a mighty source of encouragement to the battle-scarred troops of France and England.

I have recently seen the American Ambulance Field Service in action in different localities. They are a splendid lot of fellows, and French officers and doctors have spoken to me of their service in terms of the highest praise. Many have recently received the Croix de Guerre for courage and efficiency, and whole sections have been honorably cited in army orders.

English, French, and American women have rendered valuable service in canteens and hospitals. I have seen them all at work under conditions of great danger in the past month. I almost used force to get three English ladies away from a town which was being heavily shelled. Before the impetus of the drive was quite spent I was sent to a Foyer [the French equivalent of a Y.M.C.A. hut] to help French and English women who were conducting a canteen alone. As the train was about to start, a messenger came with orders for me to descend. The place of my destination was evacuated by the ladies. The enemy forces were very close. They later occupied the town, but this was about the limit of their advance.

The German prisoners I have seen coming in are a mixed lot, some very young, others quite old for the war. They do not seem to have any advantage in physique over the English and French, and are quite inferior to the Americans. Undoubtedly the rapid and considerable advance of the enemy in the offensive begun on the Chemin des Dames was the result of the surprise with which he launched his attack and the immense numerical superiority of men and guns with which he carried on the offensive. In his second attack from Montdidier to Chateau Thierry, with masses of men and guns, he completely failed. The Allies knew of his plans and prepared.

I should like to tell a little of my personal experience. I believe many of your readers, my friends especially, would be interested, but I must refrain. I have seen the strangest mingling of peoples of all races in the battles of the past month. I have had the pleasure and privilege of passing out chocolate, drinks, biscuits, cigarettes, &c., to the soldiers going up into the firing line, to the refugees, the wounded, all in the name of the Y.M.C.A. This organisation is doing a great work. The American people may rest assured that their whole-hearted support of the Y.M.C.A. is strengthening the morale of the fighting forces of the Allies, as well as offering needed comfort, thus making final victory doubly sure.

NOTES ON SOME RECENT BOOKS.

[A short Notice in this column does not preclude a review in a later issue.]

Africanus. THE PRUSSIAN LASH IN AFRICA. Hodder & Stoughton. 143 pp., 2s. 6d. n.

An unvarnished report of the terrors of German colonial rule in Africa, a system based on slavery and resting on force and cruelty.

Barrett (Sir James W.), C.M.G., F.R.C.S. Lieut.-Col. R.A.M.C. THE TWIN IDEALS: AN EDUCATED COMMONWEALTH; with maps and diagrams; 2 vols. H. K. Lewis & Co. xxxii—512 and xx—504 pp., 25s. n.

The series of articles and addresses comprised in these volumes are remarkable alike for their scientific value, their variety, and the amount of practical information which they convey on problems of vital interest to the Empire. Some of them date from seventeen years back, when Sir James Barrett took an important part in the reorganisation of the Melbourne University, and they embody his views on the best methods of producing an educated people and an enlightened and democratic form of Government. He proceeds from the wise assumption that "liberty and justice cannot be obtained without the constant exercise of responsibility, and that an ignorant proletariat constitutes the greatest danger with which any country can be faced."

Campagnac (E. T.). ELEMENTS OF RELIGION AND RELIGIOUS TEACHING. Cambridge University Press. 139 pp., 3s. n.

Prof. Campagnac delivered these lectures for the benefit of teachers, but "inasmuch as the business of education is one not for teachers alone, but rather for society as a whole," he has now given them to a larger audience. The main function of the teacher, he suggests, is to rediscover Religion and restore it to its just authority.

Clutton-Brock (A.). STUDIES IN CHRISTIANITY. Constable. 168 pp., 4s. 6d. n.

One of the most suggestive writers of our time here discusses Christian ideas in a thoroughly modern way. Those who know his book 'The Ultimate Belief' will gladly welcome his further thoughts; those who do not, had better get his new book at once.

Dorling (Flight-Commander T. Taprell), R.N. RIBBONS AND MEDALS. London, Philip & Son. 56 pp., 2s. n.

This little book has been brought out as a supplement to 'Ribbons and Medals' published in 1916, in consequence of the great number of foreign orders and medals which have been conferred upon British soldiers since then. Even now the list is not complete and the author asks for suggestions as to any improvement which might be made.

Loyson (P. Hyacinthe). FRANCE THE APOSTLE; AND THE ETHICS OF THE WAR. University of London Press. 162 pp., 3s. n.

These three lectures were delivered before the Royal Institution of Great Britain, and their spirit is indicated in the author's statement that they were prepared for the press "when the noblest cause in history was face to face with the direst peril." They are issued as "an act of religious homage" to the British who have died defending France.

Petre (M. D.). DEMOCRACY AT THE CROSS-ROADS. Fisher Unwin. 125 pp., 4s. 6d. n.

Father Tyrrell's biographer has here imitated the title of one of his books, and exhibits the moderate sympathetic spirit revealed in her story of his life. She is heartily democratic, but urges the importance of developing an earnest and truly intelligent mind in the democracy.

PAMPHLETS.

The Freedom of Jerusalem; well illustrated. Hodder & Stoughton. 6d.

Sokolow (N.). ZIONISM IN THE BIBLE. Zionist Organisation. 2d.

THOSE who are desirous of extending a little hospitality to sailors and soldiers on leave in London should write to the Organising Secretary of the International Y.M.C.A. Hospitality League, 25 Montague Street, London, W.C.1. The League has undertaken a very important piece of work, and the warmest sympathy will be felt with their efforts to mitigate, especially for overseas men, the dangers of loneliness, the absence of friends, and the sense of being thousands of miles from home in a strange land.

THE Co-operative Holidays Association has now been in existence more than twenty-five years, and in spite of the difficulties of the present time is carrying on its excellent work with great success and enrolling new members. The Annual Report shows a total of 2,763 guests for the five centres during the past year, and under the Free Holiday scheme for necessitous people 188 persons have been benefitted. The guest-houses are situated amidst beautiful surroundings in Yorkshire, Derbyshire, Sussex, the Lake District, North Wales and Scotland, and in these days when there is a tendency to take holidays in snatches throughout the year, it is well to know where a week may be spent to the best advantage in a genial and democratic atmosphere entirely conducive to freedom from care. This year an interesting extension of the Association's activities has been its co-operation with the Canadian Y.M.C.A. in providing hospitality for Canadian soldiers on leave. The Prohibition principles which it advocates naturally appeal to those who are anxious for the welfare of the Canadian troops, and many fine young fellows from overseas have been welcomed at various centres. Full particulars of the work of the Association and the arrangements made for holiday-seekers may be obtained from the Head Offices, College House, Brunswick Street, Manchester.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Dewsbury.—On Sunday, August 25th, the Anniversary and Re-opening Services after decoration were held at Unity Church, when the minister, the Rev. John W. Maw, preached appropriate sermons to good congregations. The choir, under the direction of Mr. H. Hemingway, rendered special anthems. Both the church and the schoolroom have been redecorated with great taste and present a very pleasing and comfortable appearance. News has come to hand this week that an old Sunday scholar, Private Arthur Gillings, has gained the Military Medal for brave and distinguished conduct on the field. Arthur Gillings, who is only 20 years of age, is now lying wounded and a prisoner of war in Germany. He has been able to communicate with his parents, and is progressing favourably towards recovery.

Dundee.—The aim of the evening service in connection with the Free Religious Movement is to assist in the practical application of religion to problems of life, literature, and human destiny, and the syllabus of subjects which has been drawn up by the Leader, the Rev. Richard Lee, for the next three months includes some 'After War Problems,' studies of certain notable books, such as Lord Morley's 'Recollections' and Prof. Gilbert Murray's 'Religion of a Scholar,' Bertrand Russell's 'Outlook on Life,' 'The Reasonableness of an Armistice,' and a monthly 'Service of Joy.' There will be a discussion after some of the addresses.

Halifax.—The Rev. W. Lawrence Schroeder, Minister of the Northgate End Chapel, has arranged that a literature reading shall be given on the last Friday in the month at his house. He urges, quite rightly, that "It is good at all times, but especially good in days like the present, to refresh mind and soul at the fountains of a pure and wholesome literature. We need mental change and spiritual recreation, so that we may face the problems of the war with a freshened temper and keener determination to know and establish the truth. Good poetry is one of God's great gifts to life, for thereby we are lifted into an atmosphere in which the education of the soul proceeds sanely and strongly."—It has been decided to change the name of the congregational fund for the relief of the needy from Poor's Purse to Fellowship Fund. It was felt by the Committee that the new title "more adequately described both the operation and the field of the fund, which exists as an evidence of congregational goodwill towards those members who temporarily may need assistance."

Ireland: Moneyrea.—News has only just come to hand of the death of Col. Alexander Porter, Indian Medical Service (retired), which took place in May. Col. Porter, who was 77 years of age, was a native of Moneyrea district, being the son of the late Alexander Porter of Monlough. After a distinguished career at Queen's College, Belfast, he graduated at Queen's University, and entered the Army Medical Service when quite a young man, spending the greater part of his life in India. Although resident in England since his retirement in 1903, he never forgot his old friends and associations, and often in recent years spent prolonged holidays in his native district, where his genial presence and good nature were much appreciated by his large circle of friends. Col. Porter was a brother of the late Rev. John Porter, for many years minister of our congregation at Ballee, co. Down. Born and brought up in connection with the Unitarian congregation of Moneyrea, he never ceased to be a Unitarian in conviction, and remained a contributor to the funds of that congregation till his death. His many friends in the North of Ireland much regret his decease. He is survived by a widow, two daughters, and a son, the latter a captain in the Indian Army.

Leeds: Mill Hill.—Lieut.-Col. Bullock spoke on Sunday evening, August 18, on "Agnosticism." After explaining how Huxley invented the term, he said there were men who gloried in the term agnostic, but there was no more merit in mere agnosticism than in mere belief or mere disbelief. The person who took agnosticism for granted was no more worthy of respect than the credulous person who believed a thing just because it was told him. He would have them put their beliefs into the crucible, to see if they would stand the test. It was significant that those who had followed Huxley had been less positive as to the impossibility of knowing; that Herbert Spencer, for example, had spoken of religion as something that moved towards righteousness. But, said the preacher, at the back of righteousness there must be something conducive to righteousness. That was where "Nunquam" made his mistake, by saying that if God made man, He was responsible for all that the man did. But God had never made a man: what he had made was a being with the potentialities of a man or a woman, and if God were wholly responsible, there would have been no possibility of persons becoming men or women; they would have been merely animated machines. To say that God did not know what would be the choice of a man or woman, for the good or the bad, was no reflection on God, for God could only know the knowable, though, unlike man, he knew all that was knowable.

Last Sunday, basing his discourse on Kipling's story of 'The Ship that Found Itself,' Col. Bullock said how few were those who went through life's experience without having to encounter storms. Such lives, when they were found, were almost worthless ones. There was no way to make iron or steel plates for the ship except by putting the ore into the furnace, and burning out the dross. And so in life. There was nothing more unfortunate for a lad than to be born with a silver spoon in his mouth. Much better for him if he had to go through the world's rough-and-tumble. If they would read Kipling's story, they would find that every part of the ship was dependent on some other part. So it was in society: they were all members of one body. If the workman said to the capitalist, "I have no use for you," he would soon find himself starving. If the capitalist said to the workman, "I have no use for you," he would find himself having to do things for which he was unfitted, and gradually being reduced to poverty. This unfortunate relationship between two necessary factors of productivity would continue, however, until they took a different view of things. It was unworthy to talk about the number of "hands" that a firm employed. Let them, rather, bear in mind the word that was used when a census was taken of Abraham's household, and it was found to consist of so many "souls." What was true of the body politic was equally true of States. The world was one, and any attempt, after the war, to thrust Germany or any other people out of the comity of nations could only result in disaster. They were not "out" to destroy a people, but only that which made a people what it ought not to be. They must do the right, and, unless they did it, there could be no hope of permanent peace. The Rev. R. Nicol Cross has come home on leave, and is now in Leeds.

Pendleton.—On Sunday, September 29, a Special Service will be held at the Unitarian Church in the morning, at which the new windows, presented by Mr. G. H. Winterbottom, J.P., in memory of his father, the late Mr. Archibald Winterbottom, will be dedicated. The preachers will be the Rev. J. McDowell and the Minister, the Rev. J. Randall Jones. The windows are the work of Mr. Sylvester Sparrow, the eminent London artist.—The congregation is taking part in the effort which is being made in Salford to raise £25,000 to provide parcels of food and other necessities for prisoners of war belonging to the Lancashire Fusiliers, and Lieut.-Col. T. F. Tweed, M.C., Hon. Secretary to the Fund, will attend the evening service on September 8 and briefly explain its objects.

Sheffield: Attercliffe.—On Sunday, Sept. 1, a new turning-point will be made in the history of the Unitarian Church, for on that date the full-time ministry will begin, and Minister and people will make a new beginning. To celebrate this event a Recognition Meeting will be held on Monday, at 7.30. Mr. H. E. Fishburn will preside, and addresses will be given by ministers and laymen of the district.

Sheffield: Unity Church.—Mr. Joseph Barlow, one of the oldest and most faithful members of the church, passed away recently. He was a well-known figure in the Choir, of which he had been a member over fifty years.—On September 15 the Anniversary Services will be conducted by the Rev. Alfred Hall, and on the 29th the Rev. C. J. Street will preach at the Harvest Festival Services.

Sheffield: Upper Chapel.—A cordial welcome has been given to the Rev. Alfred Hall, who is now sharing with the Rev. C. J. Street the work of the ministry, and Mrs. Hall, at a congregational gathering presided over by Mr. G. H. Hunt. Addresses of welcome were given by the Chairman (for Trustees and Committee), Mr. W. R. Barclay (Congregation and District Association), Mr. W. Laycock (Sunday School), the Rev. T. Anderson (Ministers), the Rev. E. H. Titchmarsh (other denominations), and the Rev. C. J. Street. Letters of congratulation and goodwill were read from the Newcastle Congregation and the Northumberland and Durham District Association.—The name of the Rev. Walter Short has been added to the Roll of Honour, making 126 in all. Arthur Foster, who joined the army in February, has fallen in action at the age of 18.

Todmorden.—The Secretary's report gives the names of the following thirteen "brave boys of the congregation" who have fallen during the past year:—Tom Sunderland, Thos. W. Shackleton, Fred Greenwood, Fielden Crabtree, J. W. B. Farrar, James Pickles (missing, now presumed dead), Robert Suthers, Herbert Coupe, Ernest Butterworth, Wilfred Firth, Arthur Whipp, Ernest Barker, and Ronald Shackleton.—The membership keeps high, the present total being 272. The Women's League has given over £50 in donations to various objects. The War Savings' Association shows a membership of a hundred and an issue of nearly 800 certificates. Cordial greetings have been sent to the Rev. Chas. Biggins, junior minister who is on service in the R.A.M.C., having been granted leave of absence by the congregation for the duration of the war.

Wellington, New Zealand.—In the monthly Calendar the Rev. R. E. Hale quotes the following, with cordial agreement, from "a minister who, like myself, left an orthodox church to preserve his honesty": "We Unitarians face the opportunity of our history. In the present world war we can give a message which can come from no other people. The early disciples turned away from their grievous loss with songs on their lips and a flaming fire in their souls. It is called a miracle by some, a legend by others; the fact remains, they were baptised with something which challenged all their energies for good and unified their wills to help the world to their own joy and happiness. We may theorise about God, argue over destiny, wrangle over interpretations of Bible verses, and quibble over hair-splitting differences—all of which gets us nowhere. To-day nations are on their faces in the dust, pleading with God. Peoples, long defying the spiritual, are rushing to the feet of priests and crying for a vision of God. If a few men in the Unitarian Church, fired with a zeal for souls, aflame with a purpose to help humanity out of its indifference and doubt, and glowing with a real love for God and spiritual things could go among our churches, they would give our church a new day." He urges the importance of strengthening the church during the remaining months before he enters camp, in full realisation of the great opportunity which lies before Unitarians of giving the world at the present time a message such as no other people can deliver. The testing time will probably come to the cause in Wellington, together with other churches, as a result of the sacrifices they are making for the war, and we hope they will be able to meet it in a spirit of loyal devotion and consecration.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

All letters and manuscripts for the Editor should be sent to 13 Bream's Buildings, Fetter Lane, London, E.C.4. They must reach the Editor not later than Wednesday morning for publication the same week.

SEPTEMBER is indeed adding to its calendar of "stricken fields." If we hesitate to use Cromwell's phrase respecting Worcester, coming on the anniversary of Dunbar, and to speak of the British and Canadian turning of the enemy's line of fortification as a "crowning victory," and if our gallant French Allies have not as yet wiped out the memories of Sedan by a full fruition of their valour farther south, it is recognised even by cautious observers that the German position has gone from bad to worse day by day. The month is still but young; and, warned as we are not to expect "too much," we should be less than human, far less than patriots, if we did not cherish great hopes. And what should we be if we did not acknowledge by more than words the zeal and devotion of those who are, with such noble constancy, fighting the good fight? With our grateful pride are mingled sorrow and mourning over those who die that liberty may live; they must not have died in vain.

IF the readers of THE INQUIRER desire at this day of great things to contribute greatly, in their measure, towards the support and succour of some at least of our brave soldiers, will they not respond heartily and speedily to the "Huts Fund" appeal made by the Rev. W. H. Drummond in our columns last week? As will be seen from the list on another page an encouraging start has been made, but the sum required—which is for the repair and further equipment of premises in a great French centre through which many thousands of men pass every week and where bodily and spiritual comforts are untiringly provided for them—amounts to five hundred pounds. It really needs no long time to raise, if we are half as much in earnest as the men were who swept over the "switch line" on Monday. One little word, please: when writing cheques kindly remember, if possible, the extra penny stamp! But rather forget it and send, than hold back.

* * *

TO-MORROW the jubilee will occur of the founding of the Good Templars Order in Great Britain, the founder being Mr. Joseph Malins, who in 1868 formed a lodge at a little chapel in Birmingham in imitation of a movement started in America. Appealing, like other Orders, "ancient" or otherwise, to the love of ceremonial and symbolism, the Good Templars society has met with so much success that it claims a roll-call of nearly three-quarters of a million members belonging to about a hundred different nations and States. A reception by the Lord Mayor and a commemorative service in St. Paul's sufficiently indicates the esteem in which a movement, once rather ridiculed, now stands. It has undoubtedly taken a considerable share in the education of the popular mind, and thus in the great advance made by temperance principles in the past half century.

* * *

WHILE the policy of prohibition throughout the United States appears likely to be enacted soon, Lord D'Abernon views the control system set up in this country as sufficiently successful. He says that convictions for drunkenness are now only 13 per cent. of the number registered in 1913; and while he does not think it probable that total prohibition will be adopted here he is strongly of opinion that a return to pre-war laxity and excess is "quite unthinkable." He lays stress on the beneficial results of diminishing the alcoholic strength of beer and spirits, and also on restriction of consumption by intervals of closing the public-houses. There is no probability, he believes, of the removal of present regulations during the war and for a year thereafter; and there is not the slightest chance that Britain will drift back into the old conditions.

* * *

How wide an interval separates the ideals of democracy from the temper actually displayed from time to time by the masses is illustrated by the lamentable out-breaks of "mob-law" against which President Wilson has been speaking very severely. The abomination of lynching is, unhappily, no novelty in the States, and for many years it has given rise to strong protest on the part of those true citizens who see in law the one hope of orderly society and real freedom. But these deeds of violence, not against individuals only but against the spirit of that self-government which is professed as the supreme aim of the popular State, are specially deplorable in the hour when we are supposed to be all united in the effort of putting down the lawlessness of German ambition. Feeling is, no doubt, sometimes too intense to be held back by reason; but it is a sorry record to read, for instance, that a Woolwich mob, not content with stopping an undesired meeting, proceeded to kick the unconscious body of one of the victims of their assault. The question suggests itself whether we are really so civilised as we sometimes boast.

"DURING the war," said Mr. Lloyd George last week, "we have in this country doubled the power of the working classes," and he affirmed, what the Labour Congress on Wednesday supported, that Labour leaders are heartily at one in resisting military domination. There can be no doubt of it, or that in the long run the power of the working classes, if combined with intelligence and reason, will effectually resist it everywhere. That there is still, however, much to learn, both by Labour and Capital, is proved by the occurrence of the strikes which have multiplied so discredibly, and sometimes dangerously, of late. It is no credit to the community that the better way of adjusting competing interests is so often abandoned for the worse

AMONG the contributions to the correspondence on Reunion to which we referred recently a letter from Dean Moore Ede of Worcester affords an illustration of co-operation among the Churches in the United States. It has arisen, like so many other manifestations of a broad inclusiveness where narrowness used to be the rule, in connection with the war. The War Department, says The Federal Bulletin, has established a great Training School for Chaplains. On the faculty are an Episcopalian, a Methodist Episcopalian, a Baptist, and a Roman Catholic, and in the last entry into the School were Methodists, Roman Catholics, Baptists, Presbyterians, Lutherans, and Congregationalists. In the Navy a Roman Catholic Chaplain of the Fleet, recommended by Protestant as well as Catholic chaplains, has been appointed inspector and adviser to all chaplains in the Fleet, of all denominations. "We are not yet ready," says the Dean, "for such co-operation in Great Britain, but it is well for us to realise that it can exist without compromising a man's loyalty to his own branch of the Church."

* * *

WE observe that in the Address officially issued by the Methodist Conference emphasis is laid on the need of "transforming" the popular mind in all lands if a League of Nations is to endure. There is also much good counsel on other points, among them social reconstruction; but The Methodist Times rather cruelly says the Address is "interesting from the archæological point of view, but not otherwise of great value," and suggests that where it is read at all it is received simply with "patient boredom." The worst of it is that our contemporary's estimate is probably as applicable to official documents elsewhere as to those in Methodist circles. More "actuality" is evidently needed than can be generally imparted in a committee-room; excellent work can be done there, but for vital and vitalising fire people usually seek elsewhere. Perhaps there is too much "breeding in-and-in"—a crossing with minds of another type, face to face intercourse with men of other churches, or even of none, would probably result in a more vigorous growth.

* * *

THERE has reached us from Boston, U.S.A., 'The Soul of America in Time of War,' representative sermons by fifteen Unitarian ministers. The volume is edited by the Rev. Samuel A. Eliot, who in his preface says that the sermons set forth the normal spirit and utterance of representative Unitarian ministers during the first year of America's entry into the great war. The preachers recognise the immediate duties and practical necessities of the hour. They conceive the war as a solemn duty, but they have put restraint upon their speech. They have applied in their preaching, adds Dr. Eliot, the wisdom of Abraham Lincoln's saying: "At times like these men should utter nothing for which they would not willingly be responsible through time and eternity." Among the preachers are Howard N. Brown, S. M. Crothers, P. R. Frothingham, J. Haynes Holmes, and Francis G. Peabody.

THE "MAYFLOWER" RETURNS.

FLITTING ahead of the great convoys laden with the fate of dynasties and nations and streaming incessantly eastward across the wind-swept Atlantic, the mind pictures ever a tiny vessel, by comparison with those huge transports a mere cock-boat. Nigh upon three centuries ago the frail body of this mystic spirit leader of the fleets was sailing the other way, "alone, on a wide, wide sea," bearing all unconsciously in its breast the germ of a mighty national life. Frail was the boat, named fitly after the fleeting blossom of the spring; how should such a thing survive the perils of that billowy sea? "Go boldly on," said the storm-tossed adventurer to the Adriatic seaman, "Go boldly on, thou carriest Cæsar and Cæsar's fortunes." The fortunes, not of any Cæsar, but of mankind were embarked upon the 'Mayflower' when she sailed from Plymouth on September 6, 1620.

On board was a little company of a hundred and two souls, a mere handful of much persecuted, long anxious, resolute men and women, with their infants. Little could they or any mortal guess what would result in after ages from that day's deed. Dreams they doubtless had, and hopes,—some fears perhaps, certainly, as the stormy voyage dragged out its slow length. Their fears, dispelled for a while in the joy of reaching shore at last, though the new land gave them but a November welcome, were deepened into many actual sorrows and sufferings, as they bent their energies on the task of the mere maintenance of life. He who has stood in the bleak hill-side burial ground, made sacred to all time by the dust of those pioneers, can but marvel at the indomitable faith and courage with which they endured all, and in spite of dangers, losses, and pains resolutely held on their way till their emigrant fellowship, recruited from time to time by newcomers from Old England, became at last a New England overseas.

"The pilgrims," says Bancroft, "were Englishmen, Protestants, exiles from conscience, men disciplined by misfortune, cultivated by opportunities of extensive observation, equal in rank as in rights, and bound by no code but that of religion or the public will." In these words we read the secret of their ever developing polity, as the scattered settlements drew into organised unity, and became definitely constituted States. Other venturers the earth has seen in ancient times—Greek, Phœnician, Scandinavian. Each type has left its impress on the world, and wise would be the historian who should correctly measure the gifts they severally imparted to the cause of civilisation. More modern expeditions, of longer or shorter continuance, have set forth from different European stocks, notably to the various regions of North and South America, and these also in their own ways have opened new chapters in the story of mankind. But, if race egotism do not pervert our judgment altogether, the founding of a New England in the West three centuries ago was a political, a religious, event pregnant beyond all the rest. Granted that the land itself, with its wonderful variety and unlimited natural resources has contributed indispensably towards the growth of the vast nation now knit into the greatest Republic the world has ever seen, no discerning student can miss the supreme part played in its development by the influence of the ideals which the pilgrims took with them, and which have been indelibly stamped upon the whole life of the people.

About midway between their departure on that memorable September day and these September days, so fraught with destiny, the New England States, accustomed through five generations to the principles and practice of sturdy self-government, rejected forcibly the incompatible claims of the British crown. To-day, the vastly larger Union, animated throughout by the same political instinct, has found itself unable any longer to maintain a position aloof from the "quarrels of Europe," as its orators used to say but a few years ago. Claims totally incompatible with the liberty of men in all lands have been made by the representatives of an Empire to which the notion of "government of the people, by the people, for the people," as Lincoln put it, evidently appears but a puerile sentiment. Germany's torpedoes have indeed sunk the 'Lusitania,' but the shock of the explosion has called the 'Mayflower' from her haven, and now she pilots the unexpected millions on their way to the field where this issue must be tried out to the uttermost. And when these eastward convoys in turn, mighty as they are, have all vanished from bodily vision like the boat that bore the pilgrims to the west, the ideals which she represented, and which they represent, will sail onward still, gleaming in front of every new endeavour of mankind to achieve and consolidate true liberty.

By a slip we credited Lord Robert Cecil last week with the letter on the Lansdowne proposals written to the Dean of Christ Church. It was Lord Hugh's.

MR. ROOSEVELT has given over £9,000 representing part of the Nobel Peace Prize awarded to him for his services in connection with the Peace of Portsmouth, which ended the Russo-Japanese war, to be distributed between the American Red Cross, Y.M.C.A. and Y.W.C.A., the Salvation Army, the Knights of Columbus War Activities Committee, and several other institutions and committees engaged in war work.

THE demand for the first number of the new Government quarterly review, Reveille, edited by Mr. John Galsworthy, was so great that the first impression was exhausted a few days after publication, and many people were, consequently, unable to obtain their copies. The second impression, however, is now ready, and the review can be obtained from H.M. Stationery Office, Imperial House, Kingsway, London, W.C.2. or through any bookseller. It contains articles by Sir John Collie, C.M.G., the Rt. Hon. John Hodge, M.P. (Minister of Pensions), Col. Sir Robert Jones, C.B., Rudyard Kipling, J. M. Barrie, Joseph Conrad, and others.

WHOLESONE THOUGHTS FOR TIRESOME DAYS.

By the
Rev. ERNEST J. BOWDEN, B.D.
(Victoria, B.C.).

THEY are gleaned from an old-world song, and my old-world song is a Psalm—the seventy-seventh. The collection from which it is taken, as you doubtless know, was in common use as a book of melody and devotion long before our era. It is one of the miracles of human experience that the songs of an obscure and despised race should be sung and read by millions, of other races, every day in the year, and yet retain a freshness as perennial and an inspirational power as great as on the day when they first sprang from hearts torn with agony or sustained by trust.

And of all the Psalms there is none that appeals to me more than the seventy-seventh. Talk of transformations! Why, here we have a piece of commonplace wretchedness, and restless misery, bursting out into the bloom of a noble and wholesome philosophy.

I.

The writer was battling with sickness; and what could be more commonplace than his symptoms?—the stretched-out hand that betokens fevered restlessness; the moaning; the sinking sensation that accompanies faintness; the eyes, aching and hot, yet in spite of the will—held wide and staring. Then there is the rush of memory—recollections of past days that keep the brain distracted and alert, but with an activity that only accentuates its distress.

And the mental condition supervening is just as commonplace. Questions come surging into the mind; the gloom of pessimism settles on the soul:—

Will the Lord cast off for ever?
And will he be favourable no more?
Is his mercy clean gone for ever?
Doth his promise fail for evermore?
Hath God forgotten to be gracious?
Hath he in anger shut up his tender mercies?

Up to this point everything about the Psalm, excepting its poetical diction, is commonplace; scarce one of us but could have said the same things. But now, with a sudden transition, we come to an exclamation which removes the writer once and for all from the realm of the commonplace, and stamps him as a brave and chivalrous soul. His symptoms we know; his pessimism is our own; unfortunately most of us get no further; but here was a man who, right in the midst of his wretchedness, had a gleam of wholesome insight. Instead of persisting in doubt and pessimism, he said: "There is something wrong with my point of view. After all it is not God who has changed; it is my judgment which is at fault. 'This is my infirmity.'"

Those of us who are used to associating with people in pain and weariness and doubt know the gallantry of soul expressed in the words, "This is my infirmity." It is my judgment which is awry." It often happens that people are most confident of their judgment when that judgment is bitter and pessimistic. They would rather think God was a failure than confess to any possibility of misconception on their own part. They would willingly believe that eight million Canadians, or one hundred million Americans, or fifty million Britons had become blind and perverse; but would never stop to question their own sanity or judgment. In the face of this common fact of experience it is refreshing to find a character in ancient history or contemporary life who, when tempted to say "The whole world has gone mad," turns instead to his own heart and says, "There is something wrong with my outlook: 'This is my infirmity.'"

II.

But our song-writer not only diagnoses his case; he prescribes and applies a cure: and this brings us to the most valuable part of the Psalm. He determines to fill his mind with wholesome thoughts. "I will remember," he says, "the days of the right hand of the Lord"; that is, he will recall those actions of Jehovah which, beyond all dispute, are the expression of his love and favour. And, since even the happy memories of his own experience have become distorted in his fevered brain, his mind goes out to the dealings of God with his nation, which were as the landmarks of thought from which there can be no appeal. The way in which he does it gives a most realistic touch to the song, for the latter half of it might well be the ravings of a noble and gifted mind in its semi-delirium. He recalls the events of Hebrew history, but with no suggestion of historic sequence. Rather his thought wanders through vague recollections of national crises, symbolised by cataclysms of nature. He is talking of the disaster that threatened his people; and the tears and moanings of his own sickness lead him to picture the troubles of his nation by the sorrows and catastrophes of nature:—

The waters saw thee, O God;
The waters saw thee; they were afraid:
The depths also trembled
The clouds poured out water;
The skies sent out a sound:
Thine arrows also went abroad.
The voice of thy thunder was in the whirlwind;
The lightnings lightened the world;
The earth trembled and shook.

What a picture of the vicissitudes and threatened disasters of early Hebrew history! The waves rage; the deeps tremble; lightnings dart to and fro; the cyclone howls across the blackened sky; the earth shakes with the reverberations of thunder. But see where the thought of the song leads. There is One who can ride the storm and subdue it; and looking up to Jehovah his God the writer exclaims:—

Thy way was in the sea,
And thy paths in the great waters,
And thy footsteps were not known.

Then without lingering for a moment to interpret his allegory, he brings us to an abrupt climax, which is also a conclusion:—

Thou leddest thy people like a flock
By the hand of Moses and Aaron.

In all the storm and terror there was a meaning; one thing was happening, and only one—God's purposes were unfolding; by the hand of his appointed leaders he was working out the deliverance of his chosen people.

This is the formal closing of the song: the real conclusion is left to be inferred. The song-writer recalled the stirring events of Israel's history to correct his own pessimism. He has recounted the troubles of his nation; he has seen their ending in a heightened experience and broader outlook. The very parallelism of his language, if nothing else, suggests the inevitable inference. The God whose way was in the sea, whose mysterious footsteps were in the great waters, who led his people like a flock—this God is in the gloom and pessimism of his own experience—will still the fevered tempest of his life: the raging of pain and restlessness are but the ministers of his high purpose.

III.

The reign of gloom and pessimism did not end with the days of the Psalm writers; their shadows fall on our lives to-day. I have on my desk at the present moment a letter in which this sentence occurs: "I think God must have hidden his face from me: I don't know what I have done to deserve so many trials." I have another letter put aside in which I read "I lift up my empty hands before God as a symbol of the emptiness of my heart." If I could read the unwritten records of your lives I should find many such stories there. What cure shall avail when the days of weariness come upon us; when the wheels of the universe creak and groan in our ears; when God seems a fabulous monster, and the ways of men to be the ways of madness?

This is a frame of mind which is quite common while the clouds of war are over all our thoughts and actions; and none are more liable to it than earnest souls who normally are trustful and optimistic. Many of these can never think of war-clouds as being lined with silver: all they can see in them is disillusionment and disaster.

For the past generation has been one of high ideals in the affairs of nations. Arbitration, the limitation of armaments, even disarmament, have been freely discussed. The Hague tribunal has been established, and influential peace associations have been formed throughout the civilised world. We have come to know that war is barbarous, and to feel that it is needless. In the development of these ideals—in the propagandist work associated with it—the churches have taken a leading part, and none has been more active than the church we are proud to call our own. William Howard Taft and David Starr Jordan are Unitarian names that stand second to none in the great peace movement.

Now it looks on the surface of things as if their work had been swept away, as if the ideals for which they stood had perished. One by one, as the tide of war has spread, the great leaders of the pacifist movement seem to have been engulfed in its flood. The reason is clear to all practical minds. It was not disloyalty to principle, but the fact that, by the irony of fate, the Pacifist movement became a valuable adjunct to the Kaiser's secret forces. But most idealists are not practical; and so fail to see this. In the miscarriage of their hopes they see cause only for pessimism and gloom.

And this is but one aspect of the wretchedness that has overtaken men and women on account of the war. Death has entered many a home; gallant sons who were the incarnation of high aspirations for coming days are laid low, or battered mentally or physically out of all semblance to their old selves. Many to-day are crying out in anguish

Will the Lord cast off for ever?
And will he be favourable no more?
Is his mercy clean gone for ever?
Doth his promise fail for evermore?
Hath God forgotten to be gracious?
Hath he in anger shut up his tender mercies?

and many who never speak of God share in the same bitterness and pessimism.

IV.

What has this old song to say to such?

First it pulls them up sharply with a gleam of wholesome introspection. Who has the right to assume, even for a moment, that God and the universe have gone awry? There is a thousandfold more wisdom, not to say gallantry of soul and healthy sense of proportion, in the Psalmist's exclamation, "This is my infirmity: my vision is distorted; my viewpoint is false."

And we shall do well to follow him further and make his method our own. What was it? To make his mind a nest for wholesome thoughts culled from the history of his people. What a world of healthy activity is suggested for us here! And who so fortunate as the English-speaking people in their wealth of national lore that speaks of a guiding destiny?

History has this advantage that in it you see great events stripped of all subsidiary issues. This war is primarily a war for freedom, but there are a hundred confusing issues—Imperialism, jingoism, conscription, armament contracts, profiteering—and some minds dwell on these until the real heart of the conflict is quite lost to sight and sense. In history we are rid of these conflicting elements: we see the great ideals for which men lived and died; in the triumph of those ideals we see writ large the character of the Divine Being who is the source and inspiration of our national life.

This is a war for freedom,—to make the world safe for democracy. To cure the pessimism which paralyses our faith and aspiration let us take the briefest possible glance at a few of the steps of Freedom on the bloodstained path over which the Anglo-Saxon race has sought to find her.

Just over three centuries ago England was in the throes of her great break with Rome. As a last resource of tyranny the King of Spain, head of the greatest European state of that time, came on with his fleet to sweep the British from the sea, and their Queen from her dominion. The sequel was one of the most glorious episodes of our history. The English rose as one man—hurled back the tyrant, and England became, in a sense unknown before, the Land of the Free.

In the seventeenth century a new tyranny arose in the heart of England itself; a tyranny whose watchword was "the Divine Right of Kings." The conflict with that tyranny lasted half a century, and plunged England into two civil wars. Cromwell in the first, and William of Orange in the second, led the forces of freedom to victory, and in England there was established once and for all the Divine Right of the People.

At the close of the eighteenth century the divine right of a section of the people was called into question. George the Third sent his troops into New England to compel its people to his way of thinking. But the farmers of New England rose against the royal emissaries with their scythes and shotguns, and after long conflict established the independence which Englishmen celebrate to-day as heartily as the native-born American.

Here are three examples from the history of our race in which we see order arising out of chaos, and freedom established as the result of conflict: where the call of duty was clear, and where the results were such that no sane man can call them into question.

The Armada, the Commonwealth, the Declaration of Independence,—each has one lesson to teach us. The tempest raged, the whirlwind scattered destruction, lightnings terrified, the thunder shook the earth and sky. But we, like the Hebrew bard, can look to-day into the face of God and say, Thy way was in the tempest, Thy path in the conflict of nations: Thou wert directing our destiny when we least knew it; Thou leddest thy people like a flock by the hand of Queen Bess, by the hand of Cromwell, by the hand of George Washington.

V.

Has God led our race through the conflict of past generations only to leave us now? To the normal mind such a case is unthinkable. Far better for us to say with the ancient song-writer: "My judgment is awry. 'This is my infirmity.'" The side issues of the war entangle us in their meshes. The wrong before our eyes is greater than heaven's glowing ideal which inspires our leaders. But let us learn a lesson from this old song, and from the history of our own people. Let us now summon up our confidence, have done with pessimism and gloom; and without waiting for coming generations to make acknowledgments in our behalf let us say to the God of Nations:—

Thy way is in our sea of trouble,
And thy path in the great waters of conflict:
Thou art there, though thy footsteps are hid from our eyes.
Even to-day thou art leading thy people like a flock
By the hand of those to whom the task has been appointed.

"THE SPIRIT OF MAN."

(An Anthology made by the Poet Laureate.)

AFTER a beautiful garden give me a beautiful anthology, and in both it is the artistic disposal of variety that determines the beauty. When a man has a predilection for a certain kind of flower he does only pretty well, for there is bound to be monotony. And there are anthologies collected by men who have had a passion for the poetry of a period which are delightful, but tend to cloy. Such are Bullen's 'Lyrics from Elizabethan Dramatists' and 'Lyrics from Elizabethan Song-Books.' Most of us are limited, and our limitations of taste show when we attempt variety. In making an anthology a man halts between himself and the public. Where his own tastes predominate the collection will probably be good, but he feels he ought to go beyond the bounds of his own tastes for the sake of the public, and the result often is that he satisfies neither himself nor others. In this respect the most truly dolorous compilations are books of hymns.

But our Poet Laureate seems to have a taste in poetry which is quite remarkable, for it is exquisitely fine and delightfully broad. He has produced a thing of loveliness,—the best odd volume I know. It is not by some centuries the oldest book in my library, but it is nearly the dirtiest. It has travelled thousands of miles. It has compensated for short rations, sleepless nights, and the tedious conversation of bores. To read the book is an exercise in devotion, and it has brought me to keep the canonical hours with increasing joy.

The Poet Laureate frankly asserts that man is a spiritual being, and therefore cannot dispense with the things of the spirit. Nor does he ever yearn for them so much as in times like these. To-day "we look instinctively to the seers and poets, whose sayings are the oracles and prophecies of loveliness and lovingkindness." This thought gives the tone of the whole collection. It is quite free from the exasperations of preachy-preachy, and the stodgy commonplace of the professional ethicist, whose love of third-rate poetry is almost touching. We are simply made to feel that if we really love the thing that is beautiful we have found the thing that does us most good. For according to Bridges poetry is the very soul of morals and religion. "We might almost contend that Morals is that part of Poetry which deals with conduct, and Religion that part of it which deals with the idea of God." So said our anthologist in a lecture he gave last year on poetry. In that lecture he asserted that the moral philosophers, who are professionals, could not be compared with the poets, though they are but amateurs. Did not Philip Sidney in the first and best treatise in English on poetry assert exactly the same? On the relation of poetry to religion the lecturer threw out a delightfully original thought. The monstrous ecclesiastical system which Rome had built on the Gospels drove art into disrepute. The reformers were set against art, but this natural craving in their natures found satisfaction in the language of the Bible, and so arose many unworthy ideas of God. We are not free of these yet. According to the Poet Laureate, it seems reasonable to look to our own poets for our release.

Perhaps this is why Shelley, that Prometheus defying all false gods, that Apollo of new light, is the largest contributor to the Anthology. Throughout it he sings divinely clear. Even Shakespeare bows to him in the matter of quantity. And after these two come Milton and Keats. From these four poets we get things that we have loved all our lives, and yet they are set down here with such consummate skill that many of them read like a direct message to us in these bad days, and the anthologist has gone even further than this, for he gives the message what I would call a power of individual inwardness, a mystical concentration, by selections of rare delicacy from writers like Augustine and Spinoza, and even more so by his selections from French writers, and perhaps most so by those wonderful extracts from Dostoevsky.

Of those authors who have been asked to contribute little, the collector has taken care that they should give only gold. A passage from Lamb came to me as a new thing. And I would especially mention a quotation from James, and selections from two speeches by Burke and Lincoln. Nor has any fear been shown of the moderns. Grenfell's splendid battle-poem is there, and two of the sonnets of Rupert Brooke.

There is one slight mistake in the book which should be rectified. The speech of Henry VI. quoted from Shakespeare should be at the battle of Towton, and not Wakefield. The battle of Wakefield was won by the King's party. The battle of Towton was won by the Yorkists in a blinding snow-storm which must have rendered Henry's soliloquy extremely uncomfortable.

Most of us at some time of our lives have felt that we too would like to make an anthology. I shall abide content with this one that has been presented to me for the modest sum of five shillings. But if the Poet Laureate should ever think of enlarging it, and if I could get his ear, I should plead for one extract to be added, an extract from Dr. Johnson, without whose manly presence no representative English book can possibly be reckoned complete. It is from a letter to Boswell, it is on the folly of quarrelling, and it contains the essence of a thousand sermons. "I had great pleasure in hearing that you are at last on good terms with your father. Cultivate his kindness by all honest and manly means. Life is but short; no time can be afforded but for the indulgence of real sorrow, or contests upon questions seriously momentous. Let us not throw away any of our days upon useless resentment, or contend who shall hold out longest in stubborn malignity. It is best not to be angry; and best, in the next place, to be quickly reconciled." R. H. U. B.

YALE University has conferred the degree of D.Litt. on Mr. John Masefield. Those who know him only as a poet, not averse to swear-words, know very little of his wide range of thought and ability in prose as well as verse.

THE reconstruction of the Library of the University of Louvain is proceeding, and many books have already been sent, or promised, by people in this country. The librarian of the John Rylands Library at Manchester (Mr. Guppy), who has already received and catalogued a large number of volumes, and the librarian of the House of Lords (Mr. Butler), will be glad to receive communications from those who are interested in a scheme which must appeal to all lovers of learning.

HENRY GEORGE'S 'PROGRESS AND POVERTY.'

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—To a member of "The United Committee for the Taxation of Land Values," the incident narrated by the Rev. R. F. Rattray in your last issue is of interest. It would be very interesting to learn from the Rev. Philip Wicksteed, whose brain is said to have been set "on fire" by reading 'Progress and Poverty,' whether he really studied economics simply in order to refute Henry George. A study pursued with that object could not be unbiased. May I be allowed to state, in the words of Henry George, the principle on which his teaching rests, and the policy which he advocates: "We would simply take for the community what belongs to the community—the value that attaches to land by the growth of the community; leave sacredly to the individual all that belongs to the individual." That policy does not require to be refuted by those who believe in human brotherhood, it requires to be carried out, and the sooner the better.—Yours, &c.,

CLEMENT E. PIKE.

OUR SOLDIERS' CONVALESCENT HOME.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—Being the first two discharged soldiers to visit our Convalescent Home at Great Hucklow, Buxton, we feel that we should at least say a few words on this splendid opportunity for our comrades. We have stayed there for a month, and we can say it has been the finest holiday we have yet spent, and no words of ours can suffice to praise its full benefits. It is an ideal place for any discharged soldier who requires a rest and is in need of recuperation. Mr. and Mrs. Peach, who are temporarily in charge, are untiring in their efforts to make this home all that it can be for the comfort and pleasure of the men. We can thoroughly recommend this ideal spot to our comrades as a perfect rest and change from the troubles and worries of this war. The pleasures of the district equal those of the Home, and are all that can be desired.—Yours, &c.,

OUR CALENDAR.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—Every year complaint is made of the slackness of church secretaries in keeping your Calendar of the churches correct, and I wish to emphasise it this year. Owing to the temporary closing of my own church I have for three Sundays running selected a minister elsewhere who was announced to preach and whom I wished to hear. In all three cases someone else took the service! At this period of the year no exception can be taken to the ministers being away, nor can one have anything but praise for the excellent substitute service. But it is unsatisfactory for friends up from the country to go to hear someone who is announced to preach, and to find him absent.—Yours, &c.,

MONTHLY NOTES.

WORK is going on well at Chambéry, but it is impossible to say yet when it will be finished. The transports of goods on the railways is very tedious and delays seem endless. The canteen has already been established in a small way. Two English ladies are living in a villa near by now, and they receive as many men as can walk to their house every afternoon. They give them tea, games, conversation and some music, and make a real little home for them. The men who are lucky enough to go enjoy themselves immensely. Of course it is difficult at first, but a start has been made and a brighter life has begun for the men. I am anxious they should have a little fête for Christmas this year, and I should be very glad of any little presents suitable for men—such as knives, pocket-books, pens and pencils (but not smoking accessories, as smoking is forbidden to these consumptive patients). I have an urgent appeal from a very isolated hospital for nervous and mental cases for funds for a cinema. It would be a very great distraction and pleasure to these poor fellows, who are suffering from so sad a malady. This month has also brought an unusually large number of demands from the doctors at the front. They evidently wish to be prepared for all emergencies, and their hopes are very high now that their Allies are advancing so splendidly further south.

The orphanage at Wisques in which we have always taken so great an interest has been through trying times. The boys' part was so badly bombarded in May that they had to leave at very short notice, and have now found a new home in a small château near Tours, where the American Red Cross have promised to look after them. The girls were in a much more substantial building and good dug-outs, and also seemed to show better nerve than the boys, according to the Director! They have remained, and we shall continue to help them all we can. Their numbers have slightly increased, and there are now over 150, of all ages from 3 to 17.

The "Rose Allen" hospital for children near Yvetôt has recently been enlarged by the addition of a "hut" ward. The opening ceremony took place last week, and Mr. Drummond, who is stationed within reach, was present to represent the Fund. It was a very pleasant ceremony, and the little patients acted a play and sang songs for their visitors.

I think subscribers will be interested to hear that the King of the Belgians has just given me another decoration, the "Croix de Chevalier de l'Ordre de Leopold." It is given me for "services rendered to the Belgian Army."

ROSE ALLEN.

SPECIAL WANTS.

Handkerchiefs, pyjamas, shirts, socks, cardigans, and mufflers for men.
Clothes for children and babies.

Contributions of money and clothing should be sent to Mrs. Bernard Allen, 14 Gainsborough Gardens, Hampstead, N.W.3.

THE LATE

REV. SYLVESTER HORNE.

AN interesting occasion was the opening last Tuesday of a Public Hall at Church Stretton in memory of the late Rev. Sylvester Horne, M.P. Among the many letters received from apologists for non-attendance was one from President Wilson, who spoke with feeling admiration for the work and character of Mr. Horne. Important speeches were delivered by the Bishop of Hereford and the Right Hon. Augustine Birrell, M.P. The latter said that as soon as Mr. Horne came into the House that much-abused assembly, which with all its faults retains an acute judgment of the worth of a man, knew that here was a fine man and a good man, with a passionate love for men and for work on behalf of men. They knew he was a Christian: not of the fourth nor of the fourteenth centuries, however fascinating these were, but of the nineteenth and twentieth. He did not invent new faiths for new occasions, however, and cut himself off from the background of the past. Machinery was no good without the soil and the seed. He was, moreover, a historical Nonconformist; that was to say he thought he knew why he was one. He was not a schismatic because he loved schism for schism's sake. To be baptised into the spirit of disruption and revolt was not for him a pleasing sacrament. Mr. Birrell made some characteristic remarks about libraries. Though he was, he said, the last man to criticise the library of a Nonconformist minister, he thought it was a pity men filled their shelves with books they knew they would agree with. "If you must read one side only, read the other side," he said. Every Anglican ought to have and read a book he used to turn over in his father's library, Calamy's 'Memorial of the Ejected Ministers in 1666,' and every Nonconformist minister should read 'Walker's Sufferings,' the account of the clergy harassed and sequestered in the Great Rebellion of 1640. What kind of a world was it going to be after this epoch, this forcing-house of ideas, of the war, he continued. There were some hopes, if we had faith, of some ideas being realised; but human nature, it was important to remember, would remain very much the same. It was idle to threaten Providence with "must"; he heard that absurd word on all sides, even from that master of dignified and world-carrying expressions, President Wilson. War would not change human nature, but it did set people thinking thoughts about the things that really mattered.

The Bishop of Hereford said he had a deep, even a jealous, admiration of Mr. Horne's work, and was grateful that this building was built in his diocese. Speaking of Mr. Horne as a Congregationalist, the Bishop said he was a true representative of that most distinctive type of English Nonconformity: the one original contribution of English theological thought. Speaking humorously of the distribution of "honours," so much deprecated by many who, seated on a sort of Stylites pillar of privilege, regarded the bestowal of honours on the undifferentiated masses at their feet as uncalled for, Dr. Henson said it was true that the best work and the most honour-worthy personality was not likely to be detected in a world like this. He was tired of hearing that the churches had failed. The success of a church was not measured by its numbers or its money, but by the quality of the men it turned out. The wonderful virtues built into the very fabric of the character of the men of this country—ready to respond to an appeal, as they had shown—that was the work of Christianity and the churches. He did not care whether these men could repeat a creed or not. The churches manifestly had not failed. He wished every diocese in his parish could have a building like that, and welcomed every worker for human good of whatever name as his colleague and co-worker. F.R.

DECORATIONS FOR AMERICAN UNITARIANS AT THE FRONT.

THE European despatches of the last week have brought news that will interest a good many Unitarians, says The Christian Register. The King of Italy has decorated with the Croix de Guerre certain members of the Ambulance Unit of the American Red Cross for "heroic work" in the fierce battles of June. This Ambulance Unit was largely recruited from the Sophomore and Freshman classes at Harvard College and is composed of young men under draft age. The Unit had been at work in three sections on the Italian front only a few weeks when the great battles began. Among these thirty picked young men from the Harvard R. O. T. C. who have now received this testimony to their valour and serviceableness are a number of boys bearing names well known in the Unitarian fellowship. Charles W. Eliot bears the name of his honoured grandfather and is the son of the president of the American Unitarian Association. S. R. Droppers is the son of the United States Minister to Greece, who was formerly associated with the Unitarian mission in Japan. E. E. Allen, Jr., is the son of the eminent head of the Perkins Institution for the Blind and a member of the Church of the Disciples, Boston. G. C. Noyes is the son of Mrs. William Noyes, the treasurer of the Alliance. Bryant Prescott is the son of the chairman of the standing committee of the Unitarian church in New Bedford, Mass., G. N. Carpenter and H. M. Spelman, Jr., belong to families that are identified with the Unitarian church at Castine, Me., and the First Parish of Cambridge. A. E. Chambers, W. H. Kenyon, Jr., and C. J. Young are graduates of the Hackley School in the class of 1917. Among other familiar names are those of Frothingham, Fiske, Goodwin, Gibbs, Howard, White, Bangs, Lothrop, Page, Palmer, Slade, Thorndike, Villard, and Wadsworth. The Register extends its congratulations to the homes and churches where these gallant boys were bred.

MR. A. EARLE, of Liverpool, has given £2,000 for the erection of a granite peace cross at the end of the war within the precincts of the Cathedral or on some adjacent spot. It is suggested that the space surrounding it shall be used by any denomination for religious meetings.

MEMORIAL NOTICE.

MR. GEORGE GAVIN LAIDLER.

WE record with sincere regret the death of Mr. G. G. Laidler who died suddenly at Tirril, Penrith, on August 28, aged 75 years. Mr. Laidler, who was a well-known Unitarian layman, and had responded during his long life to many calls to service with great ability and steadfast devotion, was descended from a Newcastle family, and had, through his parents, a close connection lasting over a century with the Church of the Divine Unity at Newcastle-upon-Tyne and its predecessor, the Hanover Square Chapel. As a boy he attended the Hanover Square Chapel and schools, becoming a teacher in the latter. Later he served on the Church Committee, and was for seventeen years the trusted secretary of the congregation. He also supported Unitarian Missionary enterprises, not only by gifts of money, although they benefited by his boundless generosity, but also as an organiser of the work. He had a most winning personality, and will be remembered with loving admiration, and with grateful respect by all who knew him.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Auckland, N.Z.—The death is recorded in the Unitarian Church Calendar of William Ansell Horner, who was killed in France on April 10, and whose father died on March 24. Private C. L. Leeds was killed in action on May 30.—The church organ has recently been overhauled, and an organ recital given to demonstrate the fine quality of its new tones.

Belper.—The Rev. J. A. Carrara Davies of Glasfryn, Cefn-Coed, has accepted the unanimous invitation of the Belper Unitarian congregation to become their minister and will enter upon his new duties at the beginning of December next.

Bootle.—The name of the beloved minister of Bootle Free Church has been added to the list of those included in the Roll of Honour (eleven) who have been killed in action. At a special meeting of the congregation held on August 6 a resolution was passed, all present standing, expressing the heartfelt sorrow with which the news of his death was received. "We wish to record," it proceeds, "our loving appreciation of his unflinching kindness and sympathy; of his complete unselfishness and his anxiety to be ever employed in promoting the happiness of others; and of the deep sense of duty that characterised his devotion to a High Calling, and that finally led him, having the oughly counted the cost, to give up his chosen and loved career as a minister of religion and join H.M. Forces, in order that he might take his part in maintaining those ideals of International Justice of Public Right and of Individual Liberty, the very existence of which, he was profoundly convinced, was involved in the present conflict. We mourn him as a citizen and a patriot who withheld no part of the price demanded by his country: as a Minister much beloved by his people, and as a friend who cheerfully and willingly gave the last and greatest proof of his love."

Chester.—A silver identification disc, suitably inscribed, and some Treasury Notes, have been forwarded to Pte. D. G. Evans, who is in camp near Hartlepool, as a token of the esteem in which he is held by friends and fellow worshippers at Matthew Henry's Chapel, and in recognition of his valued services in connection with the choir, Sunday school, and work of the Chapel generally.—The death is announced of Pte. George Powell, 1st Cheshire Regt., which occurred on July 26. He had been in France sixteen months, where he had seen much service, when he was sent to Italy. After five months in that country he returned to France, and there made the supreme sacrifice. He had been brought up in the Sunday school, and was faithful in his attendance. Of small stature he was a courageous lad of indomitable spirit. Corporal J. Pickett was also killed in action on August 19.

Chowbent.—The trenchant sermon preached at Chowbent Chapel by the Rev. J. J. Wright on Sunday morning, August 25, on 'No Exclusion in Religion,' which was listened to by representatives of most of the churches in Atherton in protest against Unitarians being excluded from the "United" Service on Intercession Day, can be obtained, price 2d., from Messrs. Collins and Darwell, Ltd., Hope Street, Leigh. All proceeds will be given to the Fund which provides Christmas gifts for Chowbent boys away on service.

Halifax.—During this month the Rev. W. L. Shroeder will preach on Sunday evenings at Northgate End Chapel on certain subjects which are constantly being discussed at the present time. Last Sunday, his discourse was on 'The Moral Values of Pacifism'; on Sunday, September 8 he will deal with 'Difficulties of Democracy'; September 15, 'Social Efficiency'; and September 22, 'The Ideal State.' In reference to the recent change of title from the "Poor's Purse" to "Fellowship Fund," which we have noted in this column, it is interesting to learn on the authority of Dr. Courtney Kenny, of Downing College, Cambridge, that the term Fellowship Fund was invented, and the fellowship funds of the period were originated at Northgate End, over a hundred years ago, by Dr. Thomson, whose monument, subscribed for by Unitarians all over England, is in the Chapel. This year is the centenary of Dr. Thomson's death, and it is well that honour should be paid to the memory of so distinguished a member of the congregation, who at a Unitarian gathering at Oldham set out the idea of the Fellowship Fund system of which the present congregational fund is a necessarily limited application.

Ilford.—The Rev. Percy William Jones of Doncaster has received a cordial invitation to the ministry here, in succession to the Rev. A. H. Biggs. Mr. Jones, who was educated at Nottingham College, entered the Congregational ministry in 1896, and in 1910, in the course of successful work at Doncaster, where his liberal views attracted much attention, he became minister of the Free Christian Church, which was formed by amalgamation with the old Unitarian congregation.

London: Highgate.—On Sunday next, September 8, evening service will be resumed at Highgate Hill Unitarian Church. The preacher for the day will be Mr. H. G. Chancellor, M.P., who will take for his subject in the morning 'A Politician's Faith,' and in the evening, 'A League of Nations.'

Newport, I.W.—The Rev. Harold W. Stephenson has conducted the services and preached for the last two Sundays at the Unitarian Church. The congregations were small, but those who have attended greatly appreciated Mr. Stephenson's discourses. While at Newport he examined the books in the library, some of which are valuable, and gave useful advice in regard to them.

Reading.—Special addresses on subjects of present-day interest such as 'The Passing of the (many) Old Religions,' and 'The Coming of the One New (yet old) Religion,' by Dr. Walsh; 'Is Justice Always Done?' and 'The Enigma of Nature,' by Mr. O. A. Shrubsole; 'Albania,' by Dr. H. M. Leon; 'Some Religious Conceptions,' by Mr. Walter Hogg, LL.B., and others, are being given at the Sunday services (6.30) at the Unitarian Free Church.

Rochdale.—The Centennial Meetings in connection with Clover Street Chapel proved a great success and there were large attendances. At the Conversazione on Saturday evening, August 3, the Chairman, Mr. Walter Stott, (treasurer of the Church and of the Centenary Fund), struck the right note in his admirable opening address in which, speaking from his long and prominent connection with the Chapel, the day school, and the Sunday school, he expressed his conviction that at no time had the various institutions been in a more flourishing state than they were to-day. The outlook for the future was, therefore, he said, full of promise. The other speakers, who were equally enthusiastic, were Mr. Frederick Hors-fall, Miss Smithies, Miss Elliott (daughter of the late Rev. T. R. Elliott and of Mrs. Elliott, who also was present), Mr. Wright Wilcock, and the Rev. T. P. Spedding. Interesting letters of apology for absence had been received from past members near and far. Members of the Church choir, with Mr. Stead as conductor and accompanist, rendered glees and songs in the course of the evening. It was a disappointment to all that the two former ministers of Clover Street Chapel, Alderman James Briggs, of Crewe, and the Rev. J. Crowther Hirst, of Gateacre, were unable for reasons of health to be present and take part in the services on the Sunday. The minister, the Rev. J. Evans, took the morning service, and the Rev. T. P. Spedding conducted the afternoon as well as the Communion Service. The absence of so many of the younger men on account of the war, among them some of the best workers in church and schools, was greatly regretted.

Sheffield: Attercliffe.—On Sunday, Sept. 1, the Rev. J. W. Lee began his whole-time ministry at Shirland Lane Unitarian Church and preached to a good congregation on 'Our New Opportunity.' On Monday evening the Recognition Meeting was held, when addresses were given by the Revs. C. J. Street and A. Hall, Mrs. Ross, Mr. W. Sinclair, Mr. A. King and Mr. H. Bailey. Mr. H. E. Fishburn presided over a representative gathering, which was marked by a happy spirit of cordiality and hopefulness. Letters of apology and congratulation were read from the Rev. H. Dawtre (Aberdeen), and the Rev. J. W. Cock (Newark), former ministers in charge; also from Mr. J. F. Whitehouse, Mr. W. Laycock, and Mr. W. R. Barclay (Secretary, Sheffield District Association). The Rev. J. W. and Mrs. Lee responded in suitable terms.

Stalybridge.—The Rev. John Ellis expects to begin work again with the Y.M.C.A. in France—this time he is going for the duration of the war—about September 25, after a short holiday, and the Rev. H. and Mrs. MacLachlan will take up their residence at Stalybridge on Sept. 10. As we announced a week or two ago, Mr. MacLachlan will act as locum tenens during Mr. Ellis's absence. A social meeting to wish good cheer to Mr. and Mrs. Ellis, and to welcome Mr. and Mrs. MacLachlan, will be held on September 7, when the unveiling of the second pictorial Roll of Honour which is being prepared by Mr. T. Whitehead will probably take place. Mr. Ellis will conduct Harvest Festival Services on September 8, this being the last occasion on which he will address and meet his congregation in the fellowship of worship for some time. He does not know, as yet, where he will be sent, or what kind of work will be entrusted to him, but he has stipulated that he shall go to some advanced position where the need is greatest.—Affectionate reference is made in the Unitarian Church Calendar to the death of Capt. Walter Short, who was minister at Stalybridge from 1909 to 1912.—The day school has lost a faithful and efficient teacher by the death of Miss E. Margaret Oliver on July 26, and much sympathy is felt by the congregation with her mother and sister.

Sydney.—The Rev. George Walters has recently celebrated the thirtieth anniversary of his ministry in Sydney. Various philanthropic and educational institutions united with his own church to congratulate him.

Wellington, N.Z.—The death is recorded in June of Mr. C. J. Cooke, B.A., after a short illness. He rendered loyal service to the Church at Wellington, when it was without a minister four years ago, in the capacity of Sunday school superintendent, and took a lively interest in its various activities. He was a prominent member of the Wellington French Club, and actively supported the National Schools Defence League.—The Chief Justice, Sir Robert Stout, was announced to deliver an address at the evening service on July 28.—The minister, the Rev. G. S. Hale, has recently preached on the following subjects: 'If Christ came to Wellington,' 'Is it the End of the Age?' 'Christ or Confucius,' and 'The Next Dominant Religion.'

Wigan, Park Lane.—Great sympathy is felt for the minister, the Rev. H. Fisher Short, whose brother, the Rev. Walter Short (Captain K.O.Y.L.I.) died recently, and who now mourns the loss of his wife. She passed away at an early age at a nursing home at Liverpool on Saturday last.

OUT OF THE HEART OF THE STORM.

Twelve Sermons preached at Rosslyn Hill Chapel
Hampstead, and Manchester College, Oxford.

BY

Rev. HENRY GOW, B.A.

The sermons are written by one who believes with President Wilson that "right is more precious than peace," and that no personal sorrow or loss should discourage us and turn us from our firm resolve to overthrow the Prussian autocracy. They are written too in the growing confidence that faith in God and in the supremacy of Love has become more and not less possible and real through the conflict and agony of recent times.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

All letters and manuscripts for the Editor should be sent to 13 Bream's Buildings, Fetter Lane, London, E.C.4. They must reach the Editor not later than Wednesday morning for publication the same week.

Two aspects of foreign affairs demand attention. One is too tragically real to admit of doubt—the calamitous state of Russia. The sufferings of many of the people are evidently terrible, and so far from the dominant revolutionary party being able to redress them it seems capable only, so far as the reports enable us to judge, of adding one outrage to another and plunging ever deeper into lawless terrorism. With winter before us the outlook for millions of those whom we reckoned of late our allies, and for whom surely our sympathies are still real and deep, is truly piteous, while the tragedy of the imperial family is pathetic in the extreme. And the worst of the trouble is that at present no one can see how, without inflicting still greater misery, to oust the men of mere violence and substitute a saner Government.

ance can be felt by those who desire not only a "clean peace" but a wise one.

DR. C. W. ELIOT, President Emeritus of Harvard, has discussed in a letter sent to Prof. F. C. de Sumichrast, and by him communicated last Monday to The Times, some highly important points upon which all who desire a "perfect union" (as Dr. Eliot phrases it) between the people of Great Britain and the people of the United States should endeavour to arrive at a good understanding. Among these points are the following: the proper policy in regard to backward races and trading adventures in their countries, the effective control of the seas, the Labour question, State action in regard to alcoholism and venereal disease, principles of customs and excise, and the maintenance of military forces. In some cases, Dr. Eliot says, the difficulties of coming to agreement are very great, but he does not think them insurmountable; and he urges the careful study of them in anticipation of a programme for combined action when the war is over.

THE other matter is the renewed talk about the willingness of the Central Powers to discuss peace terms. Remembering the Premier's remark to the effect that it does not follow that every one in this country who mentions peace is a traitor, we may suppose that not all Germans are insincere when they show what is called a "repentant" mood. But it will take a great deal to persuade some of us that there is any sincerity in the professions of the various spokesmen who are set up, in succession, to voice the sentiments that for the time being are supposed to be the right tune to play in the hearing of the nations, belligerent and otherwise. Count Czernin, we note, has again expressed opinions favourable to the establishment of a League of Nations; but with recent history in mind few Englishmen will build much on such utterances. Something much more solid is required before any assur-

IN a leading article on the subject our contemporary speaks of Dr. Eliot as "one of the most honoured of all the honoured names in American Universities," institutions which have played a very important part in the conversion of American opinion on the war. As Dr. Parkin (Administrator of the Rhodes Trust) says in the same issue, the sympathies of many University men in the States, accustomed as they had long been to kindly intercourse with Germans and, in many cases, educated in Germany, "were not altogether with us. They could not believe in the German atrocities until Princeton and some of her sisters had investigated the subject for themselves. They could not believe that these enormities were committed upon system until they had studied the German theory of war as laid down by its most authentic exponents, in the light of the German practice. They read and weighed the official documents issued by the belligerents."

"THEN," says Dr. Parkin, "these trained judges of evidence had no hesitation. They condemned Germany long before the general public had awakened to her crimes. American Universities are absolutely free from the Government influence which is dominant in Germany, but President Wilson's exhortation to strict neutrality imposed a severe strain on the presidents and professors who had gone into the facts. Since America entered the war they have been among the most earnest champions of its justice and the most resolute opponents of compromise throughout the Union." How zealous Dr. Eliot has been from the first in the cause of the Allies some of us will always gratefully remember.

It is just 350 years since the Unitarian Church in Transylvania was organised, with Francis David as its first bishop. The broad temper which, as we like to believe, has always characterised our religious movement, found admirable expression even so long ago, in a decree passed in 1568 by the national diet with the hearty concurrence of the king, John Sigismund. It ordered that: "The preachers shall be allowed to preach the gospel each according to his understanding," the choice of preachers was left to the people, and no man was to be molested on account of his religion. How far the various Christian communions are yet from reaching this liberal standard we have but too much evidence to show; even in these days of proposed reunion he would be a bold reformer indeed who should suggest to his orthodox brethren that Unitarians should be included. Fifty years ago, when the Transylvanian Unitarians celebrated their tercentenary, their co-religionists in this country and America were able, as unhappily they are not now, to share their festivals. Let it none the less be recorded that we still cherish warm fraternal regard for them, and hope that they and we may ere long rejoice in the deliverance of the world from the horrors inflicted by a political dogmatism which has but too well entered into the domineering spirit of the ancient ecclesiasticism.

WE have received a letter from Mr. F. G. Taylor, Coldstream Guards, who tells us he has been in the fighting since August 21 to the date of writing, September 5. As a descendant of one of the oldest British Unitarian families, whose ancestors suffered persecution and assisted in the founding of some of our churches near Manchester, he claims a right to express his opinion that it will be time enough to discuss a "Peace of the World as desired by all real Christians" when the militarist spirit of the enemy has been completely conquered. He believes it would not only teach ministers and others at home "what war really means" if they shared his experiences on the battlefield, but would go far to cure the lethargy from which, as it appears to him (though he has been seven years out of the country) our Church in Britain is suffering.

LIKE many other correspondents, Mr. Taylor gives striking testimony as to the growing breadth of religious sympathy, due to war experiences, among chaplains of the different sects, and as to the deeply religious spirit manifested by men of all denominations at open-air services held in imminent danger of death. He protests warmly against the unsympathetic tone of much preaching at home which, as he hears from men recently on leave, is occupied chiefly with denouncing the evils besetting the soldier's life in France and elsewhere; and suggests that if the preachers had undergone the "agonies" experienced by the men they would refrain from this kind of utterance.

* * *

THERE are some very radical principles set forth in the New Testament, as every one knows who has tried to make it the rule of his own life. One of these principles is that if a man will not work neither let him eat, and we are much interested in the fact that, without intending anything specially Christian apparently, our Canadian cousins are applying it quite literally. Their statute on the subject is popularly known as the "anti-loafing" law, and it enacts that any able-bodied person who draws an income without rendering an equivalent in labour to the State is liable to summons. If he can prove that he is really and adequately employed in useful ways, though not working for wages, he may go on as he is; but if not, he is compelled to engage in some task of public utility, otherwise (as we understand) his income will not be left at his disposal. Without professing to admire all the departures made by the younger members of our Commonwealth we venture to say this, at least, is a very commendable one; and if it survives the urgency of war-times so much the better—and, best of all, if the example is copied everywhere. Granted that the range of "work" is to be as wide and inclusive as possible, and reserving our own right, and that of our fellow-workers, to "loaf" on occasion, we hold that the world has no room for drones.

"UNIQUE—MAY BE, HISTORIC."

THAT is how those who were present—no mean judges—regarded a Conference held last month at Harvard. We called attention to the forthcoming event a few weeks earlier, and now we have before us a descriptive report of its proceedings. We believe some account of it will be interesting and stimulating to our readers.

The Conference came together at the invitation of Harvard University to consider problems of theological education arising out of the war. The attendants, numbering more than a hundred, were representatives of no less than fifty-three theological schools belonging to fifteen different denominations in the United States and Canada. Says The Christian Register: "These leaders of Christian thinking in America, the chosen scholarly ones among the churches of Protestantism, a little while ago seeming to some as far apart as the stars in the sky, in their separate religions, were now united into one body by their one religion." A communion service in the Appleton Chapel of the University set a consecrating seal on this goodly fellowship. "The catholic unity of the spirit was here more nearly a fact than any person present had ever known it, and, until the meetings, had dreamed that it could be."

We learn that it was the president of a Baptist College who first publicly suggested such an inter-denominational Conference, on the occasion of a dinner given last winter by the University to an assembly of teachers from his denomination's seminaries. President Lowell and his colleagues at once heartily entered into the idea, and Profs. Kirsopp Lake and H. Wilder Foote, names well-known to many in England, were among its chief organisers. Dr. Samuel A. Eliot, President of the American Unitarian Association, says: "All who cherish the hope of a growth in Christian sympathy and co-operation owe a great debt to those who initiated and carried through this significant meeting.... The community of interest and unity of spirit were not so much created as revealed." And, to quote but one more of the many impressive testimonies to the spirit of the occasion, the Dean of the Episcopal Theological School, Cambridge, Mass., says: "The Conference.... seemed hardly to realise that it was writing a new paragraph in the history of religion.... No such meeting has been held before in any land or time.... The happy accomplishment of a three days session with no disturbance of the peace, is a significant event. The brethren represented differences which their forbears held to be profane and intolerable"; and he attributes their present rapprochement to increase of courtesy, friendliness, and sympathetic understanding.

But mere kindness of sentiment, however gratifying, will not take practical people far—as Dr. Jacks maintains in regard to any future international league. There must be things to do, or attempt, in common. The Harvard Conference had a very definite and urgent reason for assembling. The subject put first for consideration was: "(a) Causes affecting the number and quality of theological students; (b) The measures to be taken by the theological schools to meet the shortage of ministers which will arise after the war." President MacKenzie of Hartford, in his opening statement, revealed a startling state of things. In 1895, he said, there were 6,616 students for the Protestant ministry in the United States; in twenty years the total had fallen steadily to nearly a thousand less. Now, the ration of clergymen to the churches existing is approximately stationary; and the conclusion is inevitable that the proportion of ill-trained, or wholly untrained, ministers is increasing, with grievous results. The "so-called Bible school, the get-wise-quick method of making clergymen" was regarded by all as one of the chief enemies of an educated ministry. Among the alleged causes of the decline we find these mentioned: the drifting of men into academic positions or into purely philanthropic and social work, the slight regard for the ministry among University authorities, the unimpressive character of the present ministers themselves and their failure to quicken the heart of youth, and "the poor connection between the churches and the seminaries. The people do not know what the seminaries are doing, because no one tells them or seems to take any interest in them." A Baptist speaker said: "The trouble is that so much time and effort among the Baptists is given to getting money that the claims of the ministry are neglected."

De te fabula! Recent discussions on this side of the Atlantic forbid the supposition that these things are quite unknown here. We are but too well aware that the evils deplored or feared in America confront us also, and that they were apparent among us long before the war. That they must certainly tend to increase during the struggle, and in the period of subsequent reaction, is no less evident. If, as President Lowell says, "the only way to make a better world is to make a more spiritual world" the problem of getting things into a healthier condition is very serious indeed. We look eagerly into the report of this notable Conference to see if, by any good fortune, there may be help and guidance for us. That there was no lack of wise suggestion we can well believe, but no one possessing a grain of wisdom himself will expect any short and swift cure for a disease which is so deeply rooted in the life conditions of our generation.

The further deliberations of the Conference dealt with such topics as "the indispensable minimum" in theological education, the obligation to train men for the different departments of ministerial work, beneficiary aid and its perils; but these points cannot be now discussed. What may yield us a fruitful hint or two is the summary of 'Findings of the Conference' given in The Register. These are presented in five sections: (1) loyally supporting the Governments of the United States and of the British Empire in the prosecution of the war and expressing desire to co-operate in every possible way, especially in proclaiming its moral aims and "the duty of continuing the struggle until a just and lasting peace for the world shall have been made possible"; (2) urging a recruiting campaign for candidates for the ministry, and appointing a Continuation Committee to promote it, to serve as a means of communication between the recruiting agencies and the theological schools, and to summon a further Conference when advisable; (3) appealing to University authorities to give guidance to students in regard to the ministry similar to that given in the case of other professions; (4) recognising the probability of special aptitudes for ministerial work arising out of war service, but recommending care to maintain a high standard of qualifications; and (5) suggesting the appointment of sectional committees to report on the several branches of the whole work.

So many new-found allies, who were formerly strangers if not opponents, may be expected to accomplish much in good time; but, like the work of the Allied nations, it is a difficult task that lies before them. It also lies before us; would that we could see such an alliance of scholarly forces over here to accomplish it.

MR. S. H. TINGLEY, of Providence, R.I., who died in July, bequeathed £10,000 to the American Unitarian Association.

THE many friends of Lawrence House will be sorry to learn that the matron, Miss Beeley, who has carried on the work so efficiently and kept the hostel in such splendid trim since its opening in June, 1916, finds herself unable to remain after the middle of October next. Thanks are due to her for all the work and care she has given, and she must be pleased to know that one of the War Office officials of high rank who recently inspected Lawrence House was astonished to find how beautifully it was kept and how many conveniences and comforts had been arranged in the small space at disposal. We can only hope that some lady may be found living in London, or having a circle of London friends, to carry on the work so auspiciously commenced by Miss Beeley and now, we trust, firmly established on lines which many of our sailors and soldiers greatly appreciate.

AFTER brief speeches by Rabbi Mattuck and Miss Montagu an address was recently presented to Mr. C. G. Montefiore at the Liberal Jewish Synagogue on the occasion of his sixtieth birthday. The signatories express the gratitude of the congregation to him for giving them "a form of public worship at once Jewish and in harmony with modern thought." His discourses have brought "enlightenment and consolation, stimulus and hope." "Above all," the address continues, "we recognise how you have comforted and cheered us in the years of trial and anguish through which we are passing. You have taught us to recognise the goodness and truth which unite men and women who under different forms acknowledge one God; and—a harder task perhaps—you have encouraged us to do full justice to adverse criticism, and to recognise sympathy from whatever quarter it is offered."

BOOKS AND REVIEWS.

THE BOOK OF DEUTERONOMY.

THE name of George Adam Smith as the scholar responsible for the present volume* of the Cambridge Bible series, is the guarantee of the excellence of the contents. The modesty of his preface might create the impression that he depended chiefly on previous scholars, especially Driver. But this book is no mere compilation from older sources; it is the work of a scholar who is thoroughly master of his subject and who moves easily within the limits which it imposes on him. The wealth of learning which his pages contain would be less valuable than it is if it were not accompanied and disposed by a sane and sober judgment. There is nothing here of the extravagant guess-work of the scholar hag-ridden by a theory. The text is not slashed and hacked, nor the words transformed into other shapes in the interest of some wild hypothesis. The self-control of the writer is shown in his admission, now and again, that the evidence is not sufficient to warrant a positive conclusion. Thus, in reviewing the arguments for the date when Deuteronomy was written, he will not allow himself to assign more precise limits than those of the century between 720 and 621 B.C. The latter date is fixed and accepted by everyone as the date when a book was brought to light in the Temple in Jerusalem whose close relation to the canonical Book of Deuteronomy is beyond dispute. But how much earlier than 621 it was written, and by whom, are questions to which at present no decisive answer has been reached. Various dates can be assigned and plausibly maintained. The reigns of Hezekiah, Manasseh and Josiah were each in their turn suitable periods for the production of such a book. But so far no crucial test is known by which to decide amongst the three. Of the actual writer, the man who could clothe such profound thoughts in the splendid language which every reader of Deuteronomy knows, there is no hint or suggestion which could lead to identification. It is characteristic of the position reached by modern scholarship that the question of Mosaic authorship is not discussed; and unless from an occasional reference to a scholar of the older type, the reader would hardly guess that Moses had ever been thought to be the original author.

And here is seen that soberness of judgment, that absence of extravagance to which reference has been made. For there is no attempt to despise the older view or those who held it, though the writer would have had no difficulty in showing the self-contradictions which the theory of the Mosaic authorship involves. He takes Deuteronomy as holding the place now commonly assigned to it, (between the earlier code known as JE, and the post-exilic legislation known as P), and interprets its contents in the light of the period to which it belongs.

"Deuteronomy has then a standpoint very distinct both from that of JE and from that of P. On the whole it is a standpoint midway between them. For on the one hand it reflects social and political and religious conditions more developed than those reflected in JE, and on the other it exhibits an organisation of religion far less developed than that in P. The worship of Jehovah sanctioned by JE at many altars—in accordance with the earlier practice in Israel—is concentrated by Deuteronomy on one only sanctuary. Deuteronomy alone has a Law of the King, while P has no reference to a king but exalts the chief priest and invests him with some at least of the distinctions of royalty; and Deuteronomy alone, it must be emphasised has a Law of the Prophet.... Above and around this conspicuous standpoint of Deuteronomy, with its consequent differences of detail, there is a different atmosphere from those we breathe in the other documents. The style of the Book is but the music of winds that blow and sing through it alone—that sing even amidst its laws."

The whole section of the Introduction which sets forth "the standpoint, doctrine and spirit" of Deuteronomy is admirably done, and a reader who may not care to go through the commentary verse by verse, or to unravel the intricacies of the singular and plural passages, will do well to read the parts of the Introduction which set forth the general character of the book, and the place it holds not merely in the literature but in the development of the religion and ethics of Israel.

The concluding section of the Introduction entitled 'Questions and their Answers' is well worth reading, especially by those who have got the notion that the Higher Critics have swept away everything for which a high antiquity or a Mosaic origin was once claimed. The form of Deuteronomy (as of the other books of the Pentateuch) is that of a work purporting to have been written by Moses, and the substance of the book shows that Moses cannot have written it. But it is well shown in this Introduction that the writer, whoever he was, had good reasons for giving to his book the form of Mosaic authorship (the charge of forgery is absurd), and it also has shown how much there was in the national life and thought and institutions, as known to the writer of Deuteronomy, which was due to Moses. He had been the creative genius of Israel, and was so recognised through all the periods of the subsequent history of the nation which he founded. It is probably true that little or nothing now remains expressed in the actual words of Moses, or such that it can be now set forth clear from the additions and re-arrangements of later editors. But of the substance of what is recorded in the Pentateuch, both narrative and legislation, much more can be regarded as historical than was admitted a generation ago. The JE narratives belong to a period between David and the eighth century. Their sources were older and in some cases much older. "But whatever the date of their sources, and the tendency of recent criticism has been to increase the emphasis on their antiquity, the general credibility of J and E cannot be denied. As Dr. Driver says, 'it is hypercritical to doubt that the outline of the narratives which have thus come down to us by two channels is historical.' 'They cannot but embody substantial elements of fact' which 'cannot be called in question by a reasonable criticism'.... the witness of J and E to Moses himself, to his influence on the people, and to the character and effects of the Divine revelation which he brought to Israel, is indubitably strong and trustworthy."

For the exposition of the contents of the Book of Deuteronomy the reader must go to Sir G. A. Smith's volume, and he will be well repaid. The present writer is reviewing his book, not the ancient code which it so faithfully expounds. The author has by this work added to the already great debt which those owe to him who have profited by his abundant knowledge and his helpful guidance. As one who has so profited, and whom it has turned with renewed pleasure back to the glorious language of the original book, the finest Hebrew prose in the Old Testament, I heartily commend this volume.

FREE CATHOLICISM AND LIBERAL CHRISTIANITY.

By the Rev. CAVENDISH MOXON, M.A.

"Is Free Catholicism a real rallying point?" asks Dr. Orchard in The Free Catholic. Let us accept his invitation and seek to answer this question: "Can all liberal and progressive Christians accept Dr. Orchard's neo-catholicism as a basis for their combined activity?"

This question at once leads us back to a prior question. What is the distinctive principle of liberal Christianity? What is it that marks it off from orthodoxy in its traditional Catholic and Protestant forms? The answer I believe to be that for us liberals Christianity is a real growth, that it has nothing eternally fixed and finally formed, that at every stage of its evolution it discards some old elements and develops new organs. Christianity as thus defined has neither immutable truths of doctrine nor unchanging principles of ethics. Here is a line which divides us in theory from all who believe that certain truths form a set of dogmas that no one without blasphemy may dare to criticise. We are also bound to deny that certain moral principles and laws were once for all revealed as the perfect standard to which all future legislation must conform. Some free Catholics seem to cross the line by asserting a progressive revelation. But they mean by this a mere addition of new truths to the perfect set they believe to have been already revealed; or a more complete unfolding of what was implied in the original revelation. In pre-Christian history they might even admit the revelation of quite new moral principles; but they consider all sound post-Christian ethics to be a mere elaboration of the simple commands of Jesus.

Some liberal Protestants seem to cross the line by admitting that many doctrines are not fixed, though one or two are true for all time. Neither the liberal Protestant nor the free Catholic form of compromise is satisfactory. They both attempt to combine two inconsistent views of Christianity. They both wish to regard it as a fixed revelation and also as a real growth.

The greatest service of the Roman Catholic modernists to the whole liberal Christian movement has been to force us to see the complete break we are making with the old way of regarding religion. These modernists insist that if we once begin to criticise the ancient doctrines, we cannot henceforth exempt any of them from our scrutiny: if we once deny the eternal fixity of one dogma we must allow others to deny the finality of all. In fact the consistent liberal Christian has no place for dogma in the old ecclesiastical sense of the word. Life knows no absolute truths and conduct needs only verifiable hypotheses.

Now is free Catholicism a rallying point for those of us whose religion is of this kind? Does Dr. Orchard really cross the line that separates the traditional dogmatists from the modernists? No, he is definitely on the dogmatic side of final authority. He declares "We are not looking for the truth: we believe we possess it. It needs to be explored, set forth: but it is already ours. We are not out to construct a new theology."

If this is the new Catholicism, in what does its freedom consist? It is evidently not a freedom to discover new truth or to discard ancient error. Dr. Orchard is convinced that the old theology is the truth and that the Catholic Church guides all our thoughts. Hence freedom can mean for the new Catholicism no more than it meant for the old—namely, freedom to live and think within the limits finally fixed by Catholic tradition. Now this taming, this domestication of thought, this perpetual guiding of the believer as an immature dependent is Catholicism indeed, but it is the opposite of individual freedom. It lacks the self-determination, the criticism of the past, and the delivery from the bonds of conviction that mark the spirit of discovery.

If our Christianity is to be free, it must become what Mr. Clutton Brock would have the Church become—a fellowship of seekers for the true, the good and the beautiful, not a corporation for the preservation of a sacred deposit from the past. By all means let Dr. Orchard have our goodwill in his attempt to save a remnant from the old Christianity for the new. But let us be quite clear that he himself is so fast bound to the past that his Catholicism cannot be a rallying point for those progressive Christians for whom the first duty is not conservation but discovery, for whom Christianity is a religion of freely expanding life and of ever renewed attempts to express in thought and rite men's aspirations and ideals.

THE RELIEF OF ALIENS HERE AND IN GERMANY.

ALTHOUGH it cannot be said that the proportion of miseries alleviated during the war is large in comparison with the sum of woe, at least some attempt has been made to lighten them; and we do well to recognise this fact especially when the accumulation of horrors threatens to overwhelm the mind. In our own country, from the first, various agencies have been at work with the hope of helping a few, if no more, of those innocent sufferers who have been caught in the dislocated machinery of life and have been sorely bruised in mind and impoverished. Among these helpful agencies we may mention the Correspondence Bureau of the International Union of Liberal Christian Women of which Miss H. Brooke Herford is secretary. Thanks to its help, many persons having friends and relatives in enemy countries and territories seized have been told what the regulations are, and have been fortunate in re-establishing the broken threads of communication, to their great relief. Last year there were about 700 correspondents on the books; at present there are over 1,500. To Dr. Elizabeth Rotten the Bureau owes much gratitude for aid in many difficult cases of English people in Berlin, Austria, and Russia, and it is pleasant to record that the English society has sometimes been able to render help in return. Communications with French places in German occupation is extremely difficult, and can only be done by messages, the limit being twenty words and sometimes even fewer. To some places a message may be sent but none may be sent back. In all such cases communication is only possible through German co-operation.

"Emergency" work also has been done by the Friends and others, and many cases of privation relieved. Such benevolence has not been too widely advertised, for sufficient reasons; but its existence and continuance will surely be approved by all who recognise—and who does not?—that many of those unfortunates who have "alien" connections, whether of birth or marriage, are totally devoid of any share in the responsibility that rests upon the rulers of their respective races.

Mr. Olaf Baker informs us that similar to, but independent of, the Friends' Emergency Committee here, a society formed early in the war at Berlin has carried on, in the face of all obstacles, an effective and ever-increasing work. Its secretary, Dr. Elizabeth Rotten, mentioned above, has organised, in company with her committee and its sympathisers, a work which, he says, "perhaps more than any other, gives vitality and a permanent value to that policy of international goodwill, without which any reconstruction of international relations cannot possibly be valid." With regard to the personnel of the Berlin office, Dr. Rotten says that all the helpers, with the exception of two neutrals, are of German nationality and parentage, and that the majority of these give their whole time for nothing, inspired by devotion to the cause only.

This work, although carried on through many channels, falls into well-defined departments. The actual relief administered to needy cases takes the form of sums of money for rent, and, in special cases, of loans, grants of food, money, food tickets, coals and clothing. The number of persons receiving assistance has continually increased, the percentage of the different nationalities helped standing thus: English, 36.0 per cent; Russians, 28.2 per cent; Rumanians, 8.4 per cent; French, 7.0 per cent; Italians, 5.6 per cent; Belgians, 3.3 per cent; Serbians, 3.3 per cent. Total 91.8 per cent.

To these must be added a certain number of Americans, Greeks, Danes, Hollanders, and some whose nationalities are not yet fixed. Among the newest cases some of the specially sad ones are those of American women, chiefly widows, whose small income was derived from the United States, and who, too old and frail to earn, now find themselves utterly without support. This is a double burden upon the resources of the Society, one of its principal aims being, as Dr. Rotten points out, to secure employment for its applicants and to enable them to dispense with the offices of charity, and become self-supporting. Recently the Society has often had the extreme satisfaction of learning that the husbands have been released from the internment camp, and have found work, so that the family no longer needed assistance. This has been particularly the case with English families; for when those Britishers interned in Ruhleben have been able to secure permanent posts, they are almost invariably set free, leave being granted for an unlimited time. In spite of this, one of the greatest difficulties is that of finding employment for enemy aliens desirous of obtaining it, although, as time goes on, fewer requests for providing work are made in vain, owing largely to the fact that the Society is in touch with various employment centres to which it can send recommendations with those seeking a livelihood.

As in the English committee, one of the chief departments is that of dealing with the children. When they are ill or needing change of air, owing to under-feeding or other causes, arrangements are made to send them—and in some cases the mother as well—to country homes for change of air. This is made possible either through co-operation with other charitable organisations, or by means of free hospitality. Dr. Rotten remarks that in those cases where the children found themselves sent away with companions without any difference being made because of their nationality, they were especially happy—significant enough when one reflects on the matter in the light of simple humanity when left to develop its own sanity. How necessary this side of the work is will easily be understood by those who realise the incalculable amount of misery entailed upon children not merely in belligerent countries, but in neutrals as well, owing to the abnormal conditions, and the ever-increasing shortage of the food supply.

In country cases, that is, those beyond the area of Berlin, regular money payments are made, but in the majority of these the necessary help is forthcoming locally, so that the central committee has only to send help occasionally when extra expenses are incurred. Personal supervision of these cases is insured either by trustworthy local residents, or by assistance bureaux. In order to extend the scope of the work, and make it more widely known, a central meeting was held some time ago at the house of Prince Lichnowsky, the late German ambassador in London, at which many important persons were present. From that time on, the work has received continuous and influential support from all parts of Germany; and it is instructive to note that part of the policy of the Society is to seek the co-operation of other relief committees, and thus to interest a still wider circle than that immediately attached to the Society itself. This procedure has been the more encouraged because it was felt to be a source of satisfaction to the aliens themselves to realise that they were not subject to special consideration, because of their nationality, but that they could legitimately lay claim to the help of general German charities, as being among those who, suffering for no fault of their own, have enjoyed the hospitality of the country before the war. Dr. Rotten states that her supporters do not contribute from philanthropic motives merely, but as a mark of grateful recognition of the work done in England for their countrymen in distress.

MR. DRUMMOND'S HUTS FUND.

IN response to the appeal of the Rev. W. H. Drummond for help towards the cost, estimated at £500, of re-equipment of the Huts in which he is now engaged in work for soldiers in France, we have received this week the sums mentioned below. Further donations will be gratefully received by the Rev. W. G. Tarrant (to whom cheques should be made payable), 13, Bream's Buildings, London, E.C.4.

A DELIGHTFUL account has been given by Miss Penelope Wheeler—a member of Miss Horniman's famous company in 1908, and now in charge of one of Miss Lena Ashwell's companies at the front—of the recitals which she has given during the past two years under the auspices of the Y.M.C.A. She had been specially asked to give Prof. Gilbert Murray's translations of certain plays of Euripides with which she toured the States, and she found that the soldiers would "crowd a hall, stand packed in the vestibule, and throng the pavement outside to listen to 'Electra,' 'Hippolytus,' 'Alceste'—though they did not like that so much—'The Trojan Women,' and 'Iphigenia in Tauris.'" Her method was to tell the story, omitting all but the essential characters, and using a little discretion in the matter of curtailing the dialogue occasionally. From these and other signs, which could be multiplied, it is evident that the scheme of a national theatre ought not to be regarded as hopeless.

OUR BELGIAN CONFRÈRE.

THE Rev. Paul Teissonnière, minister of our congregation at Brussels in succession to the Rev. J. Hocart, is now serving as Chaplain at the Belgian base in Calais. Among his recent literary activities has been the publication of a volume of verse, patriotic and religious, suitable for recitation among the soldiers. He has also issued a leaflet, in French and Walloon, setting forth in brief pithy sentences the Unitarian attitude in regard to religion. He declares that there are fewer atheists than are supposed and that to be "a believer" really means to be prepared to sacrifice oneself to ideals and principles, to country above the individual, humanity above country, and God, the truth, justice and eternal life, above all. We quote the last two sections:—

Qu'est-ce qu'un Chrétien ?

Tous les chrétiens se réclament de l'Évangile. Pourquoi ne sont-ils pas d'accord ?

Parce que les uns sont disciples de Paul, les autres de Thomas d'Acquin, les autres de Calvin, et que presque tous ont lu l'Évangile à travers le judaïsme, ou à travers le paganisme, au lieu de s'inspirer de ce qu'il a de central et d'essentiel : les paraboles du bon Samaritain et de l'Enfant prodigue.

Qu'enseignait Jésus ? Premièrement, la paternité de Dieu, c'est-à-dire la foi en un principe du bien, générateur universel de la vie et de l'esprit ; deuxièmement, la fraternité des hommes, tous de race divine, ayant pour double devoir de ne pas laisser se corrompre en eux les sources de la vie éternelle, et de pratiquer l'amour du prochain, au sein de l'humanité, famille de Dieu.

On a trouvé cela trop élémentaire. On a voulu y ajouter beaucoup d'autres choses, et c'est là dessus qu'on s'est divisé.

Que sera l'Eglise de l'avenir ?

Elle cessera de méconnaître l'Évangile de Jésus, elle le rendra à sa simplicité première, à sa pureté morale, à son sens profond. Elle bannira la superstition, le mercantilisme, l'intolérance, qui l'ont si souvent discrédité.

Au lieu de jeter l'anathème à la raison, à la science, elle alimentera leur flamme. Elle ne sera pas inflexible, elle ne sera pas autoritaire ; elle sera d'une entière loyauté intellectuelle, et ouverte à tous les progrès.

En elle se tiendront les grandes assises de la conscience universelle. Elle sera le foyer des âmes et leur phare dans la tourmente ; et quand la justice souffrira quelque part de l'oppression, elle enverra ses bons samaritains pour la relever et la défendre.

Bâtie avec les meilleurs matériaux des siècles passés, avec toutes les richesses du temps présent, elle s'élèvera dans l'atmosphère tonifiante de la liberté, de la concorde et de la paix.

Qui veut apporter sa pierre à l'édifice d'une telle église, qui veut prendre la truelle ?

CORRESPONDENCE.

LT.-COL. BULLOCK AND CHRISTIAN SCIENCE.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—I have been most interested (that is if there be any "I" as distinct from everything and everybody else that could be interested) in the letter in your issue of August 31, calling attention to a report of one of my sermons in Mill Hill Chapel, Leeds, in its reference to Christian Science. May I protest that, as I use simple dictionary words, in the simple dictionary sense, relying upon no "vocabulary" or "glossary" to convey to the initiate some hidden phantasmagorical meaning, even the most casual intellectual reading of the excerpt from the sermon would not warrant asserting that I said, "Atheism was the source of Christian Science." Somebody has blundered. There is an evident misconception of what was intended or a misrepresentation of what was said.

Let me be clear now in my definitions. When Mrs. Eddy, who hailed herself as the discoverer of Christian Science, asked for, received and depended upon an anæsthetic when in a dentist's chair, there was a possible question as to the reality of the pain or as to the value of the anæsthetic. This I would call a "misconception." But when the same Mrs. Eddy—then Mrs. Glover but formerly Mrs. Patterson—when marrying Asa Gilbert Eddy, gave her age as 40 when she was really 56, or when she insistently declared that Mr. Eddy died of "malicious mesmerism," when it was shown that he had died of definite heart disease, there was no question of possible misconception but rather a deliberate misrepresentation of facts.

Let us agree, then, that in our case there is no misrepresentation of what was said but merely a misconception of what was intended, and the question arises: "Whose is the misconception?" If it be God's misconception perhaps there are a thousand other misconceptions on God's part about a thousand other things; and there is no way for knowing when His conceptions are not misconceptions and, hence, no way of knowing just when He may be trusted. If, on the other hand, it is not God who labours under a misconception but a certain Mr. Tennant, who, in order to exist and be himself, must be distinct from anything and everything else in the universe, then there is no need for saying anything more because the whole fabric of Christian Science falls to the ground like a house of cards, i.e., there is in this case a misconception. God cannot have a misconception; therefore the misconception must be on the part of Mr. Tennant. Ergo, Mr. Tennant is not God nor any part of God, because no part of God can be more or less wise, more or less right, than every other part of God.

I did say, however, that Christian Science had its source in Pantheism—the denial of personality to God, or the assertion that everything that is is God—and against the claims of Christian Science I placed the statement that God, if He exists at all, must exist and can exist only as separate or distinct from everything and anything else, so that when personality is predicated (and it must be predicated if there is any meaning to worship or to prayer; because God can neither worship Himself nor pray to Himself) it must be distinguishable from any other personality in the universe.

Of course I expected to hear the old cry of "hopeless tangles that people get into while attempting to criticise that of which they have no knowledge." It is the sole stock in trade. "The other fellow doesn't agree with me, hence he is ignorant." But I swing back to the original proposition and ask: "Who is ignorant? God?" If God lacks knowledge in one particular perhaps He is ignorant as to a thousand other particulars. But if the people who get hopelessly tangled because they have no knowledge of one thing are not God, but separate personalities, they might have no knowledge on any one of a thousand other things, and, in their ignorance, they might step upon a tack or misuse a sharp instrument or mistake the contents of a phial filled with poison and thus cause pain or, possibly, incur the penalty of death.

Ignorance is an awful thing: God cannot be ignorant of anything—hence man is not God nor any part of God, because man is sometimes ignorant.—Yours, &c.,

C. SEYMOUR BULLOCK.

MEMORIAL NOTICE.

MRS H. FISHER SHORT.

THE congregation at Wigan has suffered a severe loss in the death of Mrs. H. Fisher Short, which we briefly mentioned last week. Coming so soon after the death of his brother, Captain Walter Short, the blow has been a heavy one for the Rev. Fisher Short, for whom and for his four children the warmest sympathy will be felt.

The interment took place at Sheffield on Wednesday, September 4, preceded by a service at Upper Chapel conducted by the Rev. Matthew R. Scott, who also gave a short address, and officiated at the graveside. Mrs. Short had a singularly winsome personality which was a ministry in itself, and she was an ideal minister's wife. But she was more than that: she was loved for her own sake, and no one thought of her as an official, though the services she rendered in church and public life were many. In the homes of the people she was received as a personal friend. Night after night she sat up nursing sick folk as though that alone were her single duty, and for a lengthy period, in one congregation, she adopted a little girl whose father was out of employment. In another she took into her charge a newly born infant until the widowed father could make arrangements for its care. Invalids were welcomed to her home and ministered unto for weeks together by her gracious hands. From time to time she entertained many of our ministers, and one and all testify to her rare courtesy and consideration, and her boundless hospitality. Brought up at Upper Chapel, Sheffield, Mrs. Short (whose name was then Lismer) was first a scholar, and later a teacher in the Sunday school. She was the first superintendent of the Sunday school at Attercliffe. At Croydon, she was a worker at the Dennett Hall Sunday school. At Crewe, Mossley, and Park Lane, she was teacher of the women's classes. The offices she filled are too numerous for special mention, but these are a few: treasurer of Mossley District Nursing Association; vice-president of Park Lane British Women's Temperance League; one of the founders and later the treasurer of the Baby Welfare Circle, Park Lane; president of the War Workers' Circle, and also of the Young Women's War Comforts Fund, Park Lane; and an active member of other public committees. With so many precious memories the Wigan congregation realise what a great gain it has been to have so fine a spirit among them.

THE Sunday School Association (Essex Hall) in conjunction with the Manchester District Sunday School Association, has prepared and published a very useful interim Hymn-book, containing nearly a hundred of the hymns most popular in our schools, as well as several opening services. The editing has been done with remarkable care and success, and schools that cannot defer replenishing till "after the war," when an enlarged edition is to be issued, cannot do better than get these 'Hymns for School and Home.' The price is 3d.

FRIENDS of temperance will not fail to notice that all breweries in the United States are to be closed on December 1. According to report, the stock of beer in hand will be exhausted by the end of January. Total prohibition of trade in alcoholic drink is expected to be in force from July next throughout the States.

THE Devalaya Association, Calcutta, which was founded in 1873 for the promotion of religious unity, brotherly co-operation and educational progress irrespective of creed or caste, has started a quarterly Review. Its former organ, The Devalaya Magazine, printed in Bengali, was discontinued six years ago, and it is felt that the time is now ripe to revive it in English. The first number includes, among other articles, an appreciative account of Miss Mary Carpenter's visit to India and the warm interest she took in women's education there, together with a portrait of her which is very pleasing.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Belfast.—Sunday, August 4, was very generally observed in the Non-Subscribing Presbyterian Churches, and at Templepatrick. The names of men on the Roll of Honour and of others known to members of the congregation who have fought and died in the great cause were read out.—Crumlin. The Rev. S. E. Bowen has gone to France to work with the Y.M.C.A. Another minister is already working there, and others have completed terms of service.—Rademon.—Mr. Henry M'Robert, the Treasurer of the Church at Rademon, died at his residence at Ballynahinch on August 6, after a protracted illness. His family had been associated with the congregation since its foundation, and he himself was always deeply interested in the welfare of the church. He gave of his time and energy ungrudgingly in its service, and was a generous supporter of institutions connected with Unitarianism in Ireland, such as the General Sustentation Fund and the Orphan Society. He was, indeed, in the words of the Minister, who delivered a memorial address on the Sunday following Mr. M'Robert's interment, a "representative Unitarian, loving the broad and ennobling views associated with the name, honest and reliable, simple and unassuming in manner, pure in life and thought, a true and faithful friend, and a good citizen."—In the course of a paper on New Zealand, read by Mrs. E. R. Jackson to members of Unity Guild, she reminded her hearers that in the establishment of Unitarianism in New Zealand, North of Ireland people have had their share. A family named Bradley, from the Ravara Congregation, emigrated, and gathered together the Unitarians in Auckland. Later this movement was revived by a Larne man, a Mr. M'Cready, and later still the Rev. W. Jellie, who was born at Moneyrea, went out, and in two years the church was built, and under his able ministry of twelve years flourished in every way.

Bolton.—The Rev. J. Cyril Flower is arranging to give a course of fortnightly lectures in the Men's Classroom on the subject of the Bible, which will begin on a date in October not yet announced.—The Secretary of the War Workers' Circle in connection with Bank Street Chapel reports that during the year ending July 31, 928 garments have been made and disposed of to various hospitals, societies, casualty clearing stations, &c.—Pioneer Charlie Mather, R.E., died of wounds in France on July 20, aged 27.

Bury: Bank Street.—The autumn meeting of the Manchester District Association of branches of the Women's League will be held at Mottram on Saturday, September 28. The service at 5.30 will be conducted by Mrs. Dowson, and Mrs. Douglas Walmsley will deliver an address.

Bury: Chesham.—A resolution of sincere thanks to the Rev. Richard Lee and Mrs. Lee (now at Dundee) for all their efforts on behalf of the Chesham congregation, for the sympathy and help extended to all in sorrow and distress, above all "for Mr. Lee's assistance and letters of advice and encouragement" to the brave lads at the war, was passed unanimously at the evening service on Sunday, July 28. On the previous evening a farewell gathering was held, when appreciative speeches were made by Mr. E. J. Barnes—who presented Mr. Lee with a case of Treasury notes on behalf of the Institute and Girls' Guild—Mrs. Stanley Warburton, and others.

Ilford.—In stating last week that the Rev. Percy Jones of Doncaster had been invited to the ministry of the Unitarian Church we were in error. We are informed that there is no foundation for the announcement, which was based on authority that is usually reliable.

Ilford: Women's League.—The opening meeting of the season of the Ilford Branch of the Women's League was held on Tuesday evening, when an address was given by Miss Maud Fyson, President of the Bulwell Women's Adult School, Nottingham. The speaker dealt attractively and eloquently with various phases of women's work, and urged that a spiritual basis was essential if the highest values were to be realised, and the best results obtained. There was a good attendance and questions were asked and answered. A hope was expressed that Miss Fyson would pay another visit to Ilford before long.

Leeds: Holbeck.—The Rev. W. R. Shanks has accepted a cordial and unanimous invitation to become the minister of Holbeck Unitarian Chapel. The members of the Mill Hill congregation and the Management of the Sustentation Fund have approved the appointment. Mr. Shanks was minister at Holbeck from 1904 to 1915, and vacated the joint pastorate at Broadway, Bradford, and Idle in June of the present year.

Liverpool: Ullet Road.—The Ullet Road Calendar contains an interesting letter from the Rev. Lawrence Redfern describing some of his experiences in France, where he began his Y.M.C.A. work at the end of July. He became acquainted at an early stage with one branch of Y.M.C.A. work which he considers admirable, namely, facilitating arrangements for some of the poor mothers who are allowed to cross the Channel to see their sons who are lying in a critical condition on the other side. Like the Rev. W. H. Drummond, who has written on this subject more than once, he finds the services which are attended by men who are just going up the line particularly impressive. "You can easily imagine the scene," he says, describing the first service of this kind which he conducted, and which was held in a tent. "A company of men standing on the borders of devastation: outside, the guns waking from the comparative slumber of the day to that activity which makes the nights here so hideous, lighting up the darkening sky with lurid flashes of light, and in the midst of it all this song of triumph:—

So be it, Lord: Thy throne shall never,
Like earth's proud empires, pass away:
Thy kingdom stands, and grows for ever,
Till all Thy creatures own Thy sway.

It was a great challenge—a challenge to consecrate all that we have and all that we are, body, mind and spirit, to the service of God's kingdom." The Y.M.C.A. and military authorities, Mr. Redfern adds, allow the greatest freedom to individual leaders and workers, and the latter help them in all sorts of ways. He himself finds much satisfaction in frequently being called upon to render services which come within the sphere of a minister's duties at home, though it may only be when one is supplying material needs, and "calculating what change ought to be given out of an English half-crown to a soldier who has bought seventy-five centimes' worth of biscuits."

London: Lay Preachers Union.—Readers of THE INQUIRER will be grieved to learn that Mr. S. Field, one of our London lay preachers, was recently knocked down by a motor ambulance near his home at New Barking and died a few hours later in Poplar Hospital. Mr. Field, who occupied a responsible position in Albert Docks, was a warmhearted and earnest worker in the cause of progressive religion. Many of our congregations in London and the South-Eastern provincial district will miss his occasional visits as an acceptable "supply." He leaves a widow, with whom much sympathy will be felt.

Manchester: Moss Side.—In the Calendar for September affectionate reference is made to the late Rev. H. C. Horsley, whose singularly frank and genial nature, uprightness of life, great abilities, and devotion to his high calling won for him the love and esteem of his congregation. "He combined within himself all the characteristics and qualities that go to make up an ideal Christian gentleman and minister of the Gospel of Christ. His sad and tragic death at so young an age cut short a most promising career. Its immediate effect is to cast a gloom over our church which will be long in lifting for we had built up the highest hopes for its future success and usefulness under his guidance and leadership. If these hopes have been doomed to disappointment yet has his brief sojourn amongst us been fruitful with refreshing blessings. We are all the better and happier for having been brought into association with his beautiful life and character. Living as he did up to his own high ideals he has left us an inspiring example, and the sincerest tribute we can pay to his memory is, in ourselves, to live up to the highest and best of which we each are capable. We deeply mourn the loss of our minister, pastor, and friend." On September 1 the pulpit was occupied by the Rev. Neander Anderton; last Sunday the Rev. John McDowell preached, and he will again officiate on September 15 for the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson. Other ministers who are supplying the pulpit during September and October are the Revs. Charles Roper (September 22), S. Crook, and W. Whitaker (morning and evening respectively on October 6), and Dendy Agate (October 20).

Mansfield.—The Rev. T. P. Spedding will conduct the services at the Old Meeting House for the first time as minister of the congregation on October 6. He will preach at the Harvest Festival the following Sunday, and on the Monday, at the Annual Gathering, he and Mrs. Spedding will receive a welcome.—Lieut. Arthur Francis Henry Peal, 5th York and Lancs Regt., attached to Trench Mortar Battery, B.E.F., has been awarded the Military Cross. During an air raid he took two guns into No Man's Land to cover his own company, so drawing the attention of the enemy upon himself, and prevented any casualties among his men.—Private Albert Davenport, 7th Battalion Leicestershire Regiment, an old Sunday scholar, lost his life on May 29 in the fighting before Rheims. He had been helping to carry in the wounded, and was struck by a shell and killed instantly.—On August 2 Mrs. Foster, one of the most devoted and self-denying workers in connection with the church, died at the age of 69, and on August 7 Mrs. Harrison passed away, also at the age of 69. Many of Mrs. Harrison's descendants have done good work for the Old Meeting, and several of them are still connected with it.—A number of soldiers from Clipstone Camp have been attending the Old Meeting on Sunday evenings and arrangements have been made to give them coffee and biscuits in the Old Parsonage after service.

Melbourne.—The Rev. Wyndham S. Heathcote, B.A., has resigned the pulpit, and leaves at the end of the present year.

Missionary Conference.—The Secretary of the Missionary Conference has just received the following reply, dated August 7, from Mr. L. C. Cornish, American Unitarian Association, to the message sent from the Annual Meeting of the Conference to the American Unitarian Association: "Dear Mr. Bushrod,—On behalf of the officers and directors of the American Unitarian Association I beg most gratefully to acknowledge the receipt of the resolutions passed by the Missionary Conference on Independence Day, and kindly conveyed to us in your letter just received. I shall have the great pleasure and honour of transmitting your communication to our entire fellowship, and beg on behalf of American Unitarians to extend to you, and through you to the Conference, our very sincere appreciation, our hearty thanks, and our earnest hope that the community of ideals and service which we are now sharing may prove to be the effective bond of union throughout all time."

Northampton.—Private Fred Facer (1st/1st Cambridge Regiment) of Northampton died of wounds in France on the 3rd inst.

Wandsworth.—Many friends in this district will hear with sincere regret of the death, last Monday, of Mr. C. A. Peek, who for many years has been a faithful supporter of Unitarian work and worship. Born at Mirfield, Yorks, sixty-three years ago, he received his early religious training at Mill Hill, Leeds. At the age of 18 he removed to London, and soon after the building of the Wandsworth Church he joined the congregation and heartily served as teacher and as secretary of the sidesmen, &c. On the beginning of the Wimbledon movement some years ago he became secretary and devoted himself zealously to the work. Mr. Peek, who was twice married, lost his second wife a short time ago. One son, of the first marriage, survives him.

BIRTH.

POWICKE.—On September 5, at Sidmouth, to the Rev. W. A. and Mrs. Powicke, a son.

MARRIAGE.

MITCHELL—FYSON.—On September 5, at the Unitarian Church, Ilford, by the Rev. Frank K. Freeston, assisted by the Rev. A. H. Biggs, Capt. Alec Duncan Mitchell, Essex Regt., eldest son of Mr. and Mrs. Alexander Mitchell of Woodford Green, to Marjory Gwendolen, youngest daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Ethelbert R. Fyson of Ilford.

DEATHS.

MIDLANE.—On September 8, the widow of Alfred Barrett Midlane of 11 Grafton Square, Clapham Common. Beloved by a wide circle of relatives and friends.

"God's finger touched her, and she slept."

PEEK.—On September 9, at Wimbledon, after an operation, Mr. Charles A. Peek, formerly of Wandsworth, aged 63.

OUT OF THE HEART OF THE STORM.

Twelve Sermons preached at Rosslyn Hill Chapel Hampstead, and Manchester College, Oxford.

BY

Rev. HENRY GOW, B.A.

The sermons are written by one who believes with President Wilson that "right is more precious than peace," and that no personal sorrow or loss should discourage us and turn us from our firm resolve to overthrow the Prussian autocracy. They are written too in the growing confidence that faith in God and in the supremacy of Love has become more and not less possible and real through the conflict and agony of recent times.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

All letters and manuscripts for the Editor should be sent to 13 Bream's Buildings, Fetter Lane, London, E.C.4. They must reach the Editor not later than Wednesday morning for publication the same week.

SEPTEMBER'S record still prospers in regard to fields won by the Allies, and the new British advance on the Hindenberg line promises further success of a gratifying kind. The Salonika front has been so long stationary that this week's captures are almost as much a welcome surprise to people here as we understand they have been unwelcome to the Bulgarians. But the most striking military event, the reduction of the St. Mihiel salient, is no doubt the more significant as giving very substantial earnest of the power of the United States army. That these things have their cost we all know, and some of us know but too well. May those who pay the price of victory be able to realise something of the high results for mankind that will accrue from our bitter days of struggle.

THE Austrian Note, inviting representatives of the belligerent nations to hold conversations—non-binding, secret, and without armistice—on possible terms of peace has failed, almost universally, to attract sympathy. While the Allies reject it, as they unmistakably do, though a concerted reply has not yet been given, the Germans, despite the fact that it appears to have been agreed upon, or at least convived at, in the general councils of the Central Powers, have no love for it, and chiefly value it as serving their psychological strategy. The chief criticisms we have noted, in a mass including speakers and writers of very different political and social outlook, are rightly directed to the entire obliviousness, apparently, of the framers of the Note that the Central Powers have done any wrong or have any restitution to make. President Wilson and his Government have summarily dismissed the document—perhaps too summarily, some think, who believe Austria could be led along the right path a good deal farther if skilfully handled. But, probably, in the long run, the strong clear line will prove best for the peace we want.

GENERAL PERSHING, the American Commander, who appears not only to be a very able soldier but also something of a humourist, has another side to his nature which is revealed in a message sent by him recently in reply to one from the Federal Council of Churches in his country. He declared that "What is necessary for the manhood of the soldier is necessary for the manhood of the citizen. We know that mere wealth and material resources and even technical skill will not suffice." He spoke of "the invisible, unconquerable force set in motion by the prayers, hopes, and ideals of Christian America" as a great help to the man in the field. Prayers, hopes, and ideals—are they not equally necessary for the men in the factory, in the mine, in the office, in the market and the exchange? Generals and admirals on our side have not been less emphatic in their testimony to the supremacy of the spiritual energy without which all human life sinks into a mere brutal competition. And it is the great need of all men—not only of those who may be killed tomorrow, but of those who may live on, and yet be dead in their soul.

THE report issued by Mr. Justice Sankey on the facts respecting Aliens at large in this country, as elicited by the special committee appointed by the Government, must give rise to mingled feelings in those quarters where suspicion and resentment, not unnatural in themselves, have been recently fostered to a fever heat by a well-organised movement in the Press and elsewhere. The evidence shows that among the Aliens not already interned many are aged, others are of many years' residence in the country and their sons are serving in our armies or have already fallen in the war, and only a small proportion are recommended for expatriation. Whether this report will really allay the agitated minds of the people who have been so skilfully stirred up we cannot say; such violent mistrust is not easily set aside. But at least it must give ground for hesitation in regard to similar agitations hereafter, whenever (as is but too likely) they occur again.

READERS will notice with interest and sympathy, we are sure, the steadily growing list of donations in response to the appeal of our friend, the Rev. W. H. Drummond, for funds to repair the hut-buildings in the great military centre in France, where he is now in charge of a most important work for the men. In a letter just to hand he cordially thanks all who have so quickly responded, while he tells us again that the re-equipment is most necessary and urgent if the staff and those who meet in the Huts are not to suffer during the severities of winter. "I do hope," he says, "my friends will do all they can to hold up my hands. If only an aeroplane could plank them down in the middle of this camp for an hour I think they would be startled, and give lavishly with both hands. To-night we had a great many at service, such a crowd of men as we never preach to at home." The Rev. W. G. Tarrant will be glad to receive further sums, large or small, as soon as possible, as the work must not be delayed.

THOSE who are able to attend next Friday's meeting of the London and South Eastern Provincial Assembly, which is to be held at Lewisham, will have an opportunity, in addition to the other items on the programme, of hearing Dr. L. P. Jacks expound the scheme of International Insurance which he has lately described in The Star as already noticed in these columns. Knowing his readiness, and indeed eagerness, to have the idea thoroughly discussed we are sure he will welcome questions and criticisms at the debate which is to follow his address; and if, as he believes, we have here the germ of a practical League of Nations anything more important to discuss at the present time can hardly be imagined.

WE are glad to see that one of our congregations, that of Park Street, Hull, has boldly taken the initiative in convening a (preliminary) meeting in that city, to which "all church organisations, political parties, social and other societies," are invited to send representatives to consider how best to diffuse a knowledge of the meaning of a League of Nations, such as is now supported by some of the world's wisest statesmen. This is a very good example and we trust that the meeting, which is to be held to-day, will not only begin a truly educational work in that important community, but stimulate many another effort of the kind. We may add that those who wish to get information or literature on the subject cannot do better than write to the League of Nations Society, 1 Central Buildings, Westminster, S.W.1.

THE newly appointed U.S.A. Ambassador, Mr. J. W. Davis, is said to have a cultured, capable, and well-balanced mind, such as befits his highly responsible position. We shall all wish the best, and expect it, from this latest change in a fine series of men. In a recent article The Times, referring to the good services of the retiring Ambassador, Dr. Page, added some remarks which may be read with special interest as a sequel to our article on the "Mayflower": "We are not one people. There are many differences between us, some of which will disappear as we come to know each other better, but others of which are inbred and permanent. At the same time we are absolutely at one in those great and simple principles which form the basis of mind, of character, and of life. By origin, by language, by religion and the moral conceptions which are bound up with religion, by literature, by institutions, by habits, and by our home ways we stand closer together than any other nations ever stood. We have the same views of right and wrong, of justice, of fair-play, of liberty, of truth. These are our common inheritance. It is for us both to develop it with our whole strength, and to see that these firm bonds are drawn closer year by year."

MR. LLOYD GEORGE'S tour in Lancashire was unfortunately cut short by an illness which is now happily past; but even from his sick chamber he was able to send forth an appeal which had great weight, we learn, with the parties in the cotton industry who were shaping for another of the many disastrous strikes which have troubled the country of late. In the course of the chief address—they say it was one of six in one day!—which the Premier made at Manchester he coined another of the memorable phrases which flash now and again into general notice. He enunciated the fact, plain enough in all conscience, that "you cannot have an A1 Empire with a C3 population." There speaks the author of the Insurance Act, and if he lives to see a competent Health Ministry established—it ought not to take much longer, though the dilatory ways of Government offices are past finding out—he may be satisfied that, whatever else he has done, he has pleaded for the lives of the poor.

THE CHURCHES' CAMPAIGN.

THE fifth war winter will evidently try many things, and among them the churches of all denominations. Our business is chiefly, of course, with our own, and the present moment is fitting for all of us to take a careful survey of the position. In ordinary times people generally regard the interval between the opening of July and the close of September as a more or less slack season. Many societies, classes, and other institutions connected with the congregations are during that period suspended. Members and their families go on holiday—more or less; ministers take a rest either by getting away altogether, or by liberal exchanges with one another. How much of these habits has survived the clash of war times we cannot presume to say; but the habit of regarding Michaelmas as a new starting-point appears to be in force still, judging by familiar indications. Whether a new start will really and effectually be made is another matter.

That the utmost vigour in the campaign should now be put forth is undeniable. We speak of our own group of churches; in other circles there are searchings of heart similar to ours. Dr. Carpenter in his address to the Council of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association a few months ago gave some results of his observations on the condition of things existing up and down the land. While he had warm words of commendation for workers whose fidelity in evil times had stood the test so far, it was clear from his report that the test had been a severe one. It will, in all probability, be severer still in the six months before us. Everyone is well aware of signs which cannot be mistaken. The strain of suffering and loss, the continued anxiety and frequent distress of mind that visit the homes of almost all people are now accompanied by an economic pressure to which everybody is subject. Money is worth but half, or less, of what it was; and while in some directions earnings and profits have increased, in others they have gone down, or at best remained stationary amid ever mounting taxation and rate-charges. These things, though they might be far worse, and though we all have cause for humble thankfulness, are too serious in their bearings upon actual daily life to be ignored. They add much to the difficulty of the churches' task.

But, on the other hand, all that imposes a burden, material or spiritual, on the life of the people, renders the churches' task more urgent. If in prosperous times only the churches have hope and abound then they are, indeed, of all human organisations most miserable. What do they exist for if not best to meet the needs of souls when those needs are most piteous? To be daunted by outward conditions, to accept defeat at the hands of adverse circumstances, is to have betrayed the cause of religion just when that cause most demands valour, faith, and service. That is the conviction which every true heart will share, whether minister or layman. The cost of liberty and right is being paid dearly by our soldiers and sailors; surely we cannot shrink from paying our quota. Compared with theirs, what is ours!

In old times there were men of martyr spirit in our churches, nor has the strain ever died wholly out. The days seem to have come when that spirit comes to our ranks to find its own again. The call is not for added zeal alone, or added wisdom in making our resources in men and money cover the needs. Assemblies and Conferences, Societies and Missions will have to undergo a test equally stringent with that of congregations. Shrunk in dimensions, harassed by the shadows of debt, worried by the practical problems that seem well-nigh insoluble, they will now have their chance of emulating the brave men in the field—many of whom never attain "distinction" and never crave for it, but just go on as duty and honour bid them.

To be able to manifest an equal courage and to achieve their own victories there is required a re-birth of the living truth in our churches. We have said often enough that a man's life consisteth not in the multitude of his possessions, that to those who love God all things can be made to work together for good, that the God of our heart's love is himself Love and all-victorious Life, eternal and immediate, pervading all things in all worlds, and really here with us, everyone, to-day. Have we, then, only half-meant all this? We have a sufficient inspiration at hand, if we only will seize it. By all the present needs of human hearts, torn with woes and chilled with ghastly doubts, the churches are summoned to acquit themselves manfully. We have reminded ourselves before that to have been assigned, still more to have grasped, a civilian part in the great crisis of our nation's fate is a humbling position. How shall any of us ever hold up his head in self-respect if he has not flung all his worth into the treasury of God, if he has not been a faithful lover and helper of souls? The worse our times the better men let us try to be.

BOOKS AND REVIEWS.

AMERICA IN THE WAR.

It is a welcome gift that has come to us from our kindred across the Atlantic, in the volume of representative sermons by fifteen Unitarian ministers, under the title 'The Soul of America in Time of War.*' Brothers in arms for more than a year the men of the United States have been with us and the Canadians and Australians, with France and Italy, and the other forces of the Allies, and we are thankful to know with what complete devotion they are of one mind with us, as to the end to be achieved. Now, in the very crisis of the world-conflict, we recognise with the deepest satisfaction the clear-sighted resolution with which they are throwing in the immense resources of the great Republic, to speak the decisive word in action, and afterwards, as we trust, in counsel, to attain a just and lasting peace.

We did not need the assurance of this volume as to the complete accord in which the brethren of our own religious community on the other side are united with us in their acceptance of the solemn responsibilities of the war, in the service of ideal ends and in readiness for sacrifice. We knew how they would respond, as we have done, with admiration and gratitude, to President Wilson's noble declarations of principle and of policy, aiming at a peace that shall be based on "generosity and justice, to the exclusion of all selfish claims to advantage," that shall carry with it "liberation for the peoples—the German peoples included," and make the world "safe for democracy." Their mind, we knew, was expressed in that solemn declaration of the President: "A supreme moment of history has come. The eyes of the people have been opened and they see. The hand of God is laid upon the nations. He will shew them favour, I devoutly believe, only if they rise to the clear heights of his own justice and mercy."

But while we did not need any fresh assurance from such a volume as this, it is very welcome, as drawing still more closely the bonds of understanding, sympathy and comradeship in a great cause, and for its reminders, which cannot be too often repeated, of the deeper things of faith, which in hours of supreme trial stir the hearts of men to the true consecration of effective and rejoicing service. Dr. Samuel A. Eliot, President of the American Unitarian Association, who edits the volume, and himself contributes one of the sermons, on 'The Faith that makes men free,' had already told us of the whole-hearted devotion with which his people were giving themselves to war service, in abundant gifts and labours for the Red Cross, and other beneficent undertakings for the welfare of the armed forces, and in the Army itself. "All our earnest young men," he wrote, "are going into one or another form of national service, so that recruiting for the ministry has practically ceased. Every young man who was studying for the Unitarian ministry at Harvard last year is now in uniform. A considerable proportion of our elder ministers are also in service." And that is the spirit which finds repeated utterance in these sermons, all of which were preached during the first year of America's participation in the war, by men at various posts of duty widely scattered over the States. One only of the fifteen sermons was preached beyond the borders of the country, at the meeting in September of last year at Montreal of the General Conference of Unitarian and other Christian Churches, which includes the Canadian churches with those of the States; but this also was by an American, the veteran Professor F. G. Peabody of Harvard. It was a sermon on 'The Things that cannot be shaken,' and it fitly holds the first place in the volume.

Out of the great catastrophe and tragedy of the war, Professor Peabody affirms, there has come a deepening sense of religion, and the conviction that faith is indestructible. So it is that after days of tribulation come days of revelation, making for a greater simplicity and sincerity in religion, and a new ideal of unity. The scaffoldings of men's construction may fall away, with all the wranglings of the sects over matters of ritual and dogma, but the building of God will stand, and the central truth remains, more clear than ever and more insistent in its claim, the truth of "the spirit of man sustained by God, the invisible King, and summoned by him to the redemption of a waiting world."

The broad lines on which that redemption is to be effected these sermons illustrate, with repeated emphasis on vital points, which the darkness of the tragedy does but throw into clearer light. Thus, in a sermon at St. Paul, Minnesota, on 'The Defence of our Heritage,' the Rev. J. D. Reid speaks a strong word for that spirit of self-sacrifice, without which the ideal aim will not be achieved in the triumph of a true democracy, as President Wilson stated it in his first war address to Congress, "for the universal dominion of right by such a concert of free peoples as will bring peace and safety to all the nations and make the world itself at last free." "It is the good citizen of the world," Mr. Reid declares "who makes the best citizen of his own nation.... America means democracy, and democracy cannot for ever be confined to any one people. In its final working out it must mean liberty and self-government for all nations." And speaking further of this high service, he touches on another point, the right valuing of human life and the highest expression of the patriotic spirit through utmost sacrifice, from which come inspiration and consecration. That "war is hell" cannot indeed be denied, but, as this preacher says, it is very far from being the whole truth. "Not Hell but Calvary is the true symbol of patriotic war. Every true soldier is a soldier of the Cross." To which may be added a word from the sermon by Dr. Crothers on 'The Immediate Duty.' To him also the inexorable demand was clear, which called America into the war, the issue of which in a just peace is only to be secured through steadfast and willing sacrifice. "It is not because men desire it," Dr. Crothers declares, "that such a peace will be established, but because multitudes of brave and simple-minded men are willing to give their lives for it." And so the Rev. W. L. Sullivan, at All Souls' Church, New York, speaking on 'The Law of Sacrifice for Men and Nations,' confesses to the same heart-searching and uplifting faith, since we see how "right may die, if there are none to die for right."

That is the heart of the matter, and this thought of unquestioning loyalty to the high ideal runs through the volume. It is finely expressed by the Rev. W. G. Eliot, of Portland, Oregon, in his sermon on 'The Creative Purpose of the Lord of Life'; by the Rev. P. R. Frothingham, at Arlington Street, Boston, speaking of 'Angels in the Wilderness'; and by the Rev. A. P. Reccord, of Springfield, Mass., who takes the parable of 'The Bow in the cloud' to indicate the many signs of hope which emerge out of the tragedy. No reminder could be more apt in this connection than his, of the Punch cartoon in the early months of the war, picturing the Kaiser's insolent triumph over the King of the Belgians, with the taunt, "So you see you've lost everything" and the undaunted reply, "Not my soul."

We are happy through the medium of these pages to have felt the hands of our brothers stretched out to us across the Atlantic, with their strong brave words. They add one more to the many assurances we have received of their gladness in the clear call that has come to them, to be with us in the sacrifice and the bearing of the great burden of these years of war. And now our prayer must be, that we may stand together to the end, with determined purpose and unclouded vision, not only in heroic action, but with the wisdom and self-restraint of generous far-seeing statesmanship, that shall prevail, in making peace, to secure a new concord among the nations and the true welfare of the world.

ANALOGIES.

SCIENCE is the alchemy whereby the rough ore of thought is transmuted to the pure gold of reason. The precious metal acted on by the aqua fortis of great minds becomes free from any alloy of doubt and a worthy setting for the diamond of inspiration. For, as when a ray falls upon this stone the single beam is broken into the colours of the spectrum, so when the illumination from the brain of genius strikes upon its facets, ground true by years of patient research, the light is scattered in a varied radiance of knowledge influencing every branch of Science. Hence arise the perceived relationships of natural laws to one another, light, heat, and sound become different velocities of the same energy, magnetism, telepathy, and hypnotism graded intensities of the same force.

Every discovery is a link in the golden chain of life, and each scientific phenomenon has its counterpart and fulfilment in human existence—induction corresponding to sympathy, temperature to temperament, attraction and repulsion to love and hate, or the swift penetrative power of certain rays to the deep intuitive perception of eternal truths. Analogies are countless. Two spirits store up a potential of affection separated by the dielectric of distance, until this is broken by the spark of love, or the influence of a pure soul attracts innumerable hearts as the magnet the fragments of metal. The force generated by the heated junction of wires related yet different in composition is an allegory of birth, the temporary disappearance of some star a symbol of the momentary veil of Death.

But there are greater powers acting through the world than attraction or repulsion, or even life and death, for every soul is joined to its Creator so that the current of His love can flow through each part more or less according to the resistance or conduction offered by a spiritual or a materialistic mind. Every scientist must surely be a pantheist or monotheist, never an agnostic, believing that God by His spirit directly energises every separate organism on earth and yet allows their free development in accordance with His eternal plan. These different aspects of one truth have been illumined by modern knowledge of atomic structure and interaction. If, as is generally held to-day, the fundamental force in the mineral, vegetable, and animal world is the product and expression of this energy, then everything which exists, from the solid rock to the intangible thought, has a single origin and a perfect unity.

Every fresh discovery is a new wonder to mankind, but to God it is only another stage in His marvellous process which is refining the world to become a fitting temple for His consecration; yet every new interpretation or extension of natural laws, every fresh scientific and earnest research, is an aid to the fulfilment of His infinite purpose.

Thus Man becomes a fellow-worker with God, and Science is no more the mere servant of reason but the prophet of Divinity.

FATHER STANTON.

I MET a preacher there I knew, and said :
Ill and o'erworked, how fare you in this scene ?

Bravely ! said he ; for I of late have been Much cheered with thoughts of Christ, the living bread.

—MATTHEW ARNOLD.

IN that delightful spot in London, the vicinity of Paul's, there used to be a coffee-house with an attractive old-fashioned air. It has gone now ; but its midday dinner used to be cheap, plain and good, and its company distinct and exclusive. A certain type of business man was wont to foregather there in his few hours of leisure, to talk old books, antiquated philosophies, and humanities long out of fashion. A peculiarly interesting figure was often of the company ; a gentleman who had evidently known much better days. He had a curious reverence for the Church of England, and a Miltonic voice. He quoted certain verses from the Bible in a way which has given those verses a distinctness to me beyond all others. He spoke the salutation of the angels to the Virgin so that you might imagine you heard the celestial visitant. One day he told us how in the midst of what he thought were spiritual difficulties, he consulted Father Stanton about his soul, and how taken aback he had been at Stanton's telling him that there was nothing the matter with his soul, but that his temper was all wrong. From that day he had generously regarded Stanton as the first Christian in the world. An exaggeration, perhaps, but there is Scripture warrant for it in the Epistle of James.

And I remember a certain lovely spring day listening in London's dinner-hour to a sermon delivered from the sun-dial in the garden of St. Botolph's, Aldersgate. The fervour of the speaker roused some hostility which was voiced by a postman. The postman turned out to be one of Father Stanton's men, and his rebuke ended with a tribute to Stanton which has kept warm in my memory for nearly thirty years.

To be enshrined in the hearts of common men and women ; to have your name on their lips as a proof of truth ; such honour have few of his saints, but Stanton had it. While the bishops and curates and other religious philistines were doing their stupid best to obstruct his work, the roughs and blackguards of London and other towns were hailing him as blessed in the name of the Lord. They went to railway stations to meet him, and even wrote menacing letters on his behalf to church dignitaries.

It is not death, says Tom Hood in a fine sonnet, to cease to breathe, or to cease to see, or to cease to think. It is death to be forgotten, to be unwept, to have No resurrection in the minds of men.

Father Stanton was that ephemeral thing, a preacher. A fool for Christ's sake, he preached to the poor and ignorant. He loved the unknown. He worked for those who had nothing to give. His bowels yearned for the bottom dog. But the saying that, "he who loses his life for my sake shall find it," is God's truth. And the book that has been written about Stanton, though not worthy of him, has the quality of vital literature. It is full of "fire and the falling of tears," inextinguishable laughter, the magic of courage, and all the romantic chivalry of the good soldier of Christ. This perpetual curate might create a legend even on these days. Few among the moderns fashion an epic out of their warfare and pilgrimage. Here is one in the making. As he stands to preach in the street we get the unconscious force and picturesqueness of an Amos or Jonah. We catch an echo of Jesus in the story of a rich young man who came to him after hearing his sermon, and eagerly asked—"What can I do?" The common people heard him gladly and moreover came to hear him in their work-day clothes. Watch the motley procession as it winds out of the darkness into the lighted nave of the church. At its head the Father, singing lustily, behind him a mob such as Shakespeare would have loved : shoemakers in leather aprons, a carpenter with his tools on his back, a lame man hopping along on crutches, costers from Hoxton, roughs out of the Kingsland Road, a sprinkling of respectables, women of all sorts. Then he speaks to them, and the words have a flash of poetry, and the incision of steel. The whole rough Saturday-night crowd sits spell-bound as he speaks. After that an extempore prayer. Then a great silence. It is broken by a woman's voice, crying out that she wants to pray. The Father hesitates, remembering St. Paul's theories. But "to help mankind one must throw aside all reason as an incumbrance, and rise on the wings of enthusiasm." If she wanted to pray he thought it was better to let her do so.

Ritualism and socialism are fashionable prattle to-day. They mean as much as other prattle. Stanton was a ritualist when you could be sent to prison for it, and a socialist when it meant daring to be thought no gentleman. The two things were to him simply the manifestation of the sacramental idea, the one in the church, the other in the world. So he passed from the church to the slums and back again. He went to both "happy as a lover." And round him are the emblems of love, poetry, laughter and tears.

He was the last of a line of English Churchmen. Latimer, Ken, Law, and other such are his fellows. Their religion is vital by its national qualities, fervid, practical, adventurous, plucky, with a sense of loneliness and the deep sea, and a sting of salt in its humour. He loved the sea. "The sea is always calling, calling"—he writes in one of his letters. And his whole religion is in keeping—a spiritual adventure.

SERMONS BY THE LATE

DR. HARGROVE.

As is well known to many of our readers, sermons by the late Rev. Charles Hargrove, D.Litt., were printed and issued regularly in the 'Mill Hill Pulpit' during his ministry at Leeds, and their high literary distinction and religious tone were recognised by all. A number of copies, as well as his MS. sermons unpublished, remain, and by his family's desire these will be given to ministers, lay-preachers, and any friend desiring them, on application. Mr. Charles Stainer, 12 Hesse Place, Hyde Park, Leeds, who published the series, will have pleasure in sending sets of three or six as may be requested ; and small parcels including both will be forwarded to secretaries of Lay Preachers Unions for distribution among their members. To cover postage a fee of 6d. or 1s. should be enclosed with the application ; any surplus will be handed over to the Soldiers' Comforts Fund.

PEOPLE who are attending the course of evening sermons by Miss Maude Royden at the City Temple are invited to stay for a meeting afterwards, when questions may be asked. This is an innovation in public worship which was started by Miss Royden last Sunday, when she invited members of the congregation to put interrogations to her on the subject of the sermon, 'The Problem of Suffering.' A large proportion remained and an interesting discussion took place.

CORRESPONDENCE.

DR. WICKSTEED AND HENRY GEORGE.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—I am away from home, and it is only now that my attention has been called to Dr. Rattray's letter in your issue of August 31. I presume that you wished to entertain your readers with an example of the game of "Russian Scandal" as I think it is called, in which a story or a piece of news is whispered round from one member of a party to another, and then the final version is compared with the original.

I feel that it would be churlish in me to sit out of the game, especially as Mr. Pike takes a friendly interest in having the original story on its account ; but it can only be with reluctance that I occupy your space with purely personal details. It is perfectly true that Mr. Webster first called my attention to 'Progress and Poverty,' in my only visit to Aberdeen, and true also that I read it on my way home and that it "set my brain on fire." But so far from being "sure that George was wrong," I associated myself with his followers, secured the vote of thanks to him in St. James's Hall, and had the honour of receiving him for a few hours in my house. I became and still am a member of both the Land Nationalising Societies.

But "with a brain on fire," indeed, and believing that the advocacy of Georgism, if successful, might lead to a revolution, I felt responsible for testing the doctrines of 'Progress and Poverty' with the utmost severity of which I was capable. I found that the professed economists, as a rule, were not inclined to take George seriously ; but Arnold Toynbee was an exception, and the two lectures on 'Progress and Poverty' which he delivered under the late Prof. Beesley's chairmanship were organised by supporters of Henry George, on my initiative. A tragic interest attaches to them as Toynbee's last public effort. I suppose it is seldom that the most careful and authoritative utterance against a reforming scheme has been arranged for, without a reply, by the propagandists of the scheme themselves. Toynbee on his side, contrary to his inclination but in accordance with his principles, gave his assent (which I would not have acted without) to my proposal to have the sixpenny edition of 'Progress and Poverty' on sale in the hall.

It was in connection with my interest in George, but rather to test my right to advocate his principle of land nationalisation than in order "to be able to refute him"—for I was straining at the leash and was willing to sacrifice everything except loyalty to truth in the cause—that I undertook the systematic study of economics. It has led me far from what was then my position, but it has neither alienated me from belief in land nationalisation nor dulled my admiration of Henry George or my gratitude to him.

As to my examination of Marx's theory of value in the forgotten periodical To-day, it was not written in answer to a challenge but was sent by me proprio motu and accepted by the editorial staff. To-day was not an organ of the Fabians, but the editors having failed, contrary to their expectation, to find anyone in the immediate Marxite succession who cared to undertake an answer appealed with better success to Bernard Shaw, whose article was rather a contribution to the discussion and an invitation to further inquiry than a refutation of my essay. I believe it is true that the whole interchange of thought had a perceptible influence in turning the Fabians away from Marxite theory.

With very sincere apologies for the length of this letter.—Yours, &c.,

PHILIP H. WICKSTEED.

DR. ORCHARD AND FREEDOM.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—The contention of the Rev. Cavenish Moxon, based upon an enthusiastic utterance of mine, that Free Catholicism is not really free, may cause misunderstanding, which perhaps you will allow me to try to remove. Free Catholics take very divergent views about the place of dogma, the amount of truth outside Christianity, and the room for progress within. But we do think that we have discovered the truth in the Catholic faith, and freedom in Catholic practice.

Now this freedom is first of all practical, because we stand for Catholicism minus coercion, whether it be intellectual, bureaucratic or economic; it marks an advance, because, among other things, we claim the freedom to be Catholic. The difficulty, of which Mr. Moxon must also be aware, is when you come to define freedom theoretically. He seems to make his definition depend upon nothing being fixed in regard to truth, and for it never to be allowable to say that you have found the truth. Now it is generally recognised that fixed points in truth often mean greater freedom. The multiplication table is a fixed truth, and if it is disregarded, it often causes a man, in this country, to lose his freedom. The trouble is, of course, that Catholicism is committed to certain things as true. One may hold that, without always agreeing that the actual definition of the truth, the reasons given for its acceptance, or the common applications of it, are the best, or exhaustive. It is a question of direction, sometimes a question of one side or other in a controversy, but not always the exact point on either side. What we have all to prove and shew is that the positions we hold to give freedom, do allow of continuous progress, do provide for a wide sweep of vision, do permit comprehension. To be inside anything does not necessarily mean that you are in prison; there may be more room inside than outside. Sometimes one dogma secures more freedom than another. For instance, an orthodox Trinitarian can be, and is bound to be a Unitarian; whereas the opposite is impossible. We simply confess that we have found Catholicism to be freer than Protestantism. We may be wrong, and when we find we are we shall be free to say so; though we shall probably not get very excited about it. But there is surely nothing inconceivable in such a position.

But Mr. Moxon thinks there is, and he proposes instead that the only rallying point for the Church is the search for the true, the good, and the beautiful. It is pretty wide, for a Church. According to his own confession Ernst Haeckel is ready for membership. It might shut out Nietzsche, and perhaps a few Pragmatists; but on the whole it means leaving the world as it is, for most men seek these things; the trouble is that they violently disagree as to what is true, beautiful or good. And, apparently, the moment you find them you are sold into slavery.

It may be well that Mr. Moxon should warn Free Christians (can Christians of any sort be free? Ask The Freethinker!) and right that he should doubt whether Free Catholics are really free; but it is strange, though by no means unprecedented, for a Liberal Churchman to condemn me for believing freely what he is bound to believe.—Yours, &c.. W. E. ORCHARD.

LIEUT.-COL. BULLOCK AND CHRISTIAN SCIENCE.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—I am turning again to the letter of Mr. Tennant re my reference to Christian Science. I have read and re-read it, trying to find the premises and the conclusion of his argument, until I am hopelessly bewildered, and now I must seize my seemingly material head, in my seemingly material hands, for there is a conception (or a misconception) on my part, or on the part of God, that I (if, indeed, I am "I") have a headache (if, indeed, there is any head to ache) a headache due, perhaps, to ignorance, but to whose ignorance, whether mine or God's, I can't decide. But, really, it makes very little difference whose is the ignorance so long as the consciousness of the pain is mine.

I quote: "Christian Science teaches that the universe of God's creating is spiritual, not material." How now? Is God creating something that is really nothing? Or is God creating a universe that is only Himself? And can the thing created and the Creator of the thing be really one and the same? But taking it for granted that something has really been created, is it really "spiritual" and not "material"? Suppose I get out of bed and, while walking across the room in the dark, step on to the thought-form known as a tack or bump into the thought-form known as a door, am I to deny my sensations and say: "Never mind! this is a spiritual universe and there is no such thing as a door or a tack"? And if someone says to me the next morning: "What are you limping for?" or "What blacked your eye and broke your nose?" am I to say, "Go along with you! who is limping?" or "Who has a black eye and a broken nose?" Am I to remind him that Mrs. Eddy says this is a spiritual universe and that people don't limp or have black eyes or a broken nose in a spiritual universe? Shall I assure him that somebody is labouring under a misconception, and that if it is not God who thinks I limp, or that I have a black eye and a broken nose, it must be my interrogator (if, indeed, there is any interrogator as distinct from "me," provided I am distinct from God?).

Once again, in Mr. Tennant's letter St. John is represented as writing to me, as if I were myself and not everybody else, and warning me to not love the world, and then, as giving me the reason for his warning, the argument that the thing that he writes about is soon to pass away. Alack and alas! the Christian Scientist says there is no such thing as a world for me to love or to pass away. How can a thing be and not be at the same time? Or how can a thing that has never been ever cease to be? Unless words are to have some definite meaning I must give the puzzle over to the inmates of some Sunday sanatorium for rich people who are insane.

I am sorry to have to take exception to that most remarkable woman, the late Mrs. Eddy (if, indeed, we must speak of her as one who was, but who now is not because she is dead—and she must be dead, for her followers in Boston buried something, whether or not it was something material is wholly immaterial, unless someone asks the fool-question as to how a spiritual body, or a thought-form body, or the conception of a body, could be buried?) But, going back to my illustration of the up-pointed tack and the half-opened door, I must protest that when I stepped on that small bit of "compounded minerals" or "aggregated substances" taken from the "constituent masses" that Mrs. Eddy speaks of as composing the earth (see Mr. Tennant's quotation), no amount of remembering any spiritual fact will change the other fact that I have a material foot and that there is a pain in my foot, just as no amount of remembering a spiritual fact could keep from Mrs. Eddy the slow wasting processes of age, nor deliver her, in spite of her teachings to the contrary, from the thing called Death.

It is not a question as to "Is I Was?" or "Was I am?" It is a simple question as to whether there is such a thing as pain. If not, why the anaesthetic? Is there such a thing as death? If not, what has become of Mrs. Eddy? What was it her followers buried in that cemetery just outside Boston? If the things we think real are not realities—if the whole thing is an illusion, a misconception—who is the illusioned? Who has the misconception? Why try to hide the issue in a multitude of words?—Yours, &c.,

Parcels have been received from:—Miss M. B. Lamb; Mr. Harold Teasdale; Unity Church, Islington, Red Cross Working Party, per Mrs. Waters; Miss C. Sharpe; Miss E. A. Eveleigh.

Contributions of money and clothing should be sent to Mrs. Bernard Allen, 14 Gainsborough Gardens, Hampstead, N.W.3.

THE Boys' Welfare Association, founded to encourage and assist employers in promoting the welfare of their young male workers, is making substantial progress, and many well-known firms have joined as members. An influential Council has been formed, which includes Sir R. Baden-Powell, and Mr. J. Hodge, M.P., Minister of Pensions.

MISS MARY MURRAY, a Colonel in the Salvation Army, who went out with the British Expeditionary Force, travelled for months by night and day on the lines of communication in the early days of the war, and had a short experience as prisoner in the hands of the Germans, has received the 1914 Star. She is a daughter of the late Lieutenant General Sir John Murray, K.C.B., and Secretary of the Naval and Military League directed by General Booth.

In response to many requests for similar conferences to those held in May last, the Free Church League for Women Suffrage have arranged a further series to be held at the Memorial Hall. Miss Maude Royden will speak on Tuesday, October 1, at 5.30, on 'The Application of Spiritual Truths to Modern Conditions.' Other subjects for discussion will be 'The Women of Tomorrow in Religion,' 'A New Conception of God,' and 'A New Conception of Prayer.' Full particulars can be obtained from the offices of the League, 30, Holborn Hall, Gray's Inn Road, W.C.1.

PRAYER AND PRAYING.

At a Conference on Prayer arranged by the Christian Evidence Society which took place at Caxton Hall recently, the Rev. A. S. J. Rawlinson said it was the fashion in modern times to endeavour to explain everything by reference to its evolution and development. It was possible to trace the history of prayer, but it must be borne in mind that the result was only history. The important point was the interpretation of the history. The right method was to treat the earlier forms of prayer in the light of the later and not vice versa. The acorn should be explained in terms of the oak, the most important fact about the acorn being that it was a potential oak. Thus it was not correct to say that Christian prayer was the same as the prayer of the savage. It was truer to say that the savage was expressing the primitive form which reached its highest level in the prayer of the Christian. The Christian does not endeavour, as the savage did, to placate or coerce the deity. The difference between the old attitude and the new was the difference between constraint and request. Prayer was not an endeavour to get God into one's power, it was the union of His children with God, an offering of all that they have and are as instruments in the doing of His will.

The model prayer was that taught by our Lord Himself. The speaker mentioned four points worthy of particular notice in the Lord's Prayer. (1) We were taught not to pray as individuals although we might pray individually. We should pray as members of a great family to "Our Father." (2) God's kingdom, will and glory must come first. (3) The spirit of forgiveness contained in the words "forgive us as we forgive those that trespass against us" was emphasised. (4) Even in the small part of the prayer which was devoted to our bodily needs we were told to pray only for necessities, not for luxuries. "Give us this day our daily bread."

There were other examples in the New Testament of model prayer as, for example, the two prayers in Gethsemane. Our Lord here prayed that, if possible, the cup might pass from him, but if that were impossible he prayed "Not my will but Thine be done." The lecturer went on to say that the general attitude of religious people who offered up this petition seemed to be that despite their own personal predilections they were afraid that the will of God would have to be done after all. Thus hymns were sung about "Thy will be done" in a minor key, as if it were necessary to resign one's self to the will of God very much against one's inclination. This was quite irreligious and opposed to the spirit of Christian prayer. Some objects of prayer were worthier than others. Thus we ought not to pray for vengeance (this would be admitted by all Christians), as it was asking for something that was morally wrong. It was possible to ask for something which we might think to be right which was nevertheless wrong. In this case we must be prepared to resign our wills to the will of God.

With reference to theoretical difficulties the speaker said that a great many people were prevented from praying because of intellectual obstacles. What he would have to say on this point would not explain how answers to prayer were possible, that was beyond human power to accomplish. All he would endeavour to do would be to clear the ground of difficulties and point the way to a proper frame of mind in which to view the question. Prayer implied that the reality behind phenomena was so far personal that it was possible for human beings to have some form of personal communion with Him. Unless this were admitted prayer was meaningless.

It further implied that the universe was not a hard mechanical order but a spiritual order. This must allow some room for freedom of action and the possibility of change. He thought that while it was true that on the level of natural law there was no room for interference in answer to prayer, yet there might be another level of action upon which God did interfere with the order of things in accordance with the wishes of His children, expressed in prayer. He did not think it impossible that God might like to be asked for things. He also suggested that certain things might do us more good if we asked for them than if we received them without asking. Another line of thought which might be pursued with profit was the idea that we were all parts of one great whole acting and re-acting upon one another.

MEMORIAL NOTICE.

CAPTAIN W. A. KEEN.

WE sincerely regret to record the death, from wounds received in action on Sept 5, of Captain William Allan Keen, Middlesex Regiment (attached Somerset Light Infantry). He was 29 years of age, the son of Mr. W. B. Keen, of Highgate and Limpsfield, and joined the Army nearly four years ago. At that time he had just begun to practise at the Chancery Bar, to which he had gone from Oxford after a distinguished academic career. From Highgate School, Captain Keen won a scholarship at Balliol, and took a first class both in Mods. and Greats. After enlisting in the Inns of Court O.T.C., he obtained his commission in the Middlesex Regiment, and served both in Egypt and Palestine, taking part in the capture of Gaza and the advance to Jerusalem and the Jordan. Attached to the West Somerset Yeomanry in those operations, he was later transferred to the Somerset Light Infantry on another front, and his death in action followed quickly his return from short home leave. His younger brother, Captain A. C. Keen, Middlesex Regiment, was killed in action on May 10, 1917.

THE Rev. Gertrude von Petzold, formerly minister at Small Heath, Birmingham, has recently taken her Doctorate in Philosophy at Giessen; in the spring of this year the Free Evangelical congregation at Königsburg invited her to the pastorate. Miss von Petzold has been living in Königsburg since Easter.

DURING the autumn a series of papers will be read in connection with the United Russia Societies Association, at King's College, and it is expected that Commander Locker Lampson, R.N.V.R., Mr. Aylmer Maude, Mrs. Rosa Newmarch, and Mr. Alexander Onou, Russian Consul-General in London, will contribute to it.

MR. MARK H. JUDGE, calling attention to Mr. Stephen Paget's incisive letter in The Times (September 4) on the proposed "War Shrine" in Hyde Park, says his protest should be backed up by all who regret to see the growth of "this un-British shrine folly." He echoes Mr. Paget's sentiments when he says: "I have lost many friends in the war. Who has not? I can say my bit of a prayer anywhere—I find the inside of a church a good place for it; I can reverence any little open-air roll of honour, raise my hat to a crucifix, and so on; but Heaven keep me from plaster pylons and cones symbolical of eternity. Let us clear our minds of cant. Which of us now, when the whole nation is in mourning, cares for stage antics in Hyde Park?"

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Adelaide.—The Rev. Wilfred Harris, M.A., who became minister here in 1908, has resigned the pulpit, as from the end of the year. His successor will be the Rev. W. S. Heathcote, B.A., whose resignation of the ministry at Melbourne was announced last week. Mr. Heathcote was formerly an Anglican minister, and has been four years at Melbourne.

Billingshurst.—Anniversary Services were held at the Free Christian Church on Sunday last. The old chapel had been beautifully decorated and friends from various parts of the district attended. The Rev. A. H. Dolphin of Lewisham was the preacher.

Framlingham and Bedfield.—Very successful Anniversary Services in connection with the Suffolk village Mission were held at Framlingham and Bedfield on September 1 and 2. The Rev. J. A. Pearson preached on Sunday evening and on Monday a public meeting was held, when addresses were given by the Revs. J. A. Pearson and J. Petherick (of Leiston), Mr. F. Youngman and the chairman, the Rev. W. H. Sands. It was hoped that Mr. Lyle Samuel (prospective Liberal candidate), would have been on the platform also, but news having just arrived of the death of his brother in action, he was unable to attend, though he sent a cordial greeting and a donation. At Bedfield the Rev. J. A. Pearson preached in the afternoon, and the Rev. W. H. Sands, the minister, in the evening. The public meeting on Tuesday was presided over by Mr. Sands, and addresses were given by Miss L. M. Tagart, the Rev. J. A. Pearson, and Mr. J. Burnip, of Eye. Hearty thanks are due to all these friends of the Mission for the fresh inspiration they have given to the small band of workers, especially to those belonging to other denominations—the Rev. J. Petherick, Mr. J. Burnip, and Mr. Lyle Samuel—who have shown their cordial sympathy with the aims and religious work of Mr. and Mrs. Sands.

Harvest Festivals.—We have received reports of Harvest Festivals from the Unitarian Church, Lewisham (September 15), when the preacher was the Rev. Harry Maguire of Billingshurst; Blackley, Manchester (also September 15), preacher, the Rev. E. H. Perry, of Stockport; and Mottram (Sept. 15), preachers the Revs. H. E. Dowson and H. McLachlan.

Hull.—A preliminary meeting will be held to-day, September 21, in connection with Park Street Church, to which all religious organisations, political parties, social and other societies are invited, to consider the possibility of a League of Nations, and to devise the best means of advocating it in the town. It is felt that every effort should be made to strengthen the hands of the Government and the Allies in their efforts for a victory that shall result in the establishment of such a League, and it is a matter of urgency that all men and women should study the subject for themselves and help their fellows to do likewise.

London: Hackney.—The 250th anniversary of the foundation of the New Gravel Pit Church congregation will be held on September 22 and 23. On Sunday the services will be conducted as follows: morning, the Rev. R. H. U. Bloor; afternoon (children's service), the Rev. Gordon Cooper; evening, Dr. Estlin Carpenter. A public meeting will be held on Monday at 7.30. Mr. J. S. Harding will preside, supported by the Mayor of Hackney (Mr. L. Stanley Johnson), Mrs. W. Wooding (representing the British and Foreign Unitarian Association), Dr. C. Herbert Smith (President, London District Unitarian Society), Mr. F. D. Bowles, J.P., C.C., (President, Sunday School Association), and others.

London: Lewisham.—The annual meeting of the London Provincial Assembly, of which particulars are given in our advertisement columns, will be held at the Unitarian Church on Friday, September 27, and on October 13, after morning service, Lady Durning-Lawrence will unveil a tablet in the church in memory of Sir Edwin Durning-Lawrence, who was a good friend and helper to the cause at Lewisham.

London: Stoke Newington.—Dr. J. Lionel Tayler will preach on Sunday morning at 11.15 at Stoke Newington Green Church on 'Holland and its Prisoners of War.' He has just returned after six weeks' lecturing to the officers interned in Holland under the auspices of the Y.M.C.A. Visitors will be heartily welcomed.

London: University Hall.—Services will be resumed at University Hall on September 22, when Dr. J. Estlin Carpenter of Oxford will preach. Dr. Carpenter will also preach on September 29 and the following arrangements have been made for October: October 6, the Rev. Priestley Prime; October 13, the Rev. H. S. Perris; October 20, the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie. The Rev. F. K. Freeston will conduct the services throughout November, and in December the Rev. Neander Anderton, B.A., Dr. Jacks, and Dr. Carpenter have promised to preach. On October 13 Mr. Perris will give some impressions of his recent American visit.

Moretonhampstead.—Mr. J. B. Leat, a loyal representative of a family that has been associated with Old chapel and Cross Chapel for generations, died on August 25, aged 64. He joined the Sunday school at an early age, and for the remainder of his life served both school and chapel with faithful devotion. He was also well known in the public life of the town. He had been an active supporter of the Bowring Library Men's Club since its initiation by the late Sir Thomas Bowring, and for a number of years was annually re-elected on the Committee. For some time he sat on the Parish Council. He was, if not the first, among the very first members of the District Branch of the Co-operative Society. The interment took place at Cross Chapel on August 28, and the memorial service on the following Sunday afternoon was largely attended.

Norwich.—The Octagon Chapel Calendar gives some details of the Young People's Class which meets at 3 o'clock each Sunday afternoon. It has drawn up an interesting programme of its own. The minister, the Rev. Margaret B. Crook, is giving a course of Bible Study, with suitable readings, for the first part of the hour. Following the Bible lesson is an address upon some other subject. On September 1, the Rev. J. V. Laughland has been invited to speak upon 'Our Churches in Canada.' On the 8th and 22nd, Miss Crook will speak upon 'Primitive Peoples in Asia.' On the 29th, Mr. J. W. Horn of Magdalen Road Men's Adult School, will tell of 'The Adult School Movement.'—From a member at the front the following pen sketch of a Remembrance Day Service behind the lines has been received: "The scene is a village in French Flanders. Thousands of men are collecting from all quarters and filling up the roads and lanes. They take up position on three sides of a mighty square. The silence can almost be felt before the living square begins to sing 'O God, our help in ages past.' Standing by us are the women of the village, nearly all in heavy black; they do not catch the words, but the meaning is plain....As we disperse marching silently away we feel we are glad to have been at the service. Some are anxious about their return to the line; many are thinking of wives and mothers in that best country of all—home; at least one battalion goes away singing—

Be Thou our guard while troubles last
And our eternal home."

Stalybridge.—A large attendance of members and friends met in the Hob Hill Sunday school on Saturday, September 7, on the occasion of an "At Home" to bid farewell to the Rev. John Ellis, who is going to France to work for the Y.M.C.A., and also to welcome the Rev. H. McLachlan, who is acting as locum tenens in his absence. The sentiments of the assembly were admirably expressed by the chairman, Mr. E. Haigh and Mr. R. Kenyon, representing the Church, by Mr. F. Oliver as the representative of the school, and by Mrs. Stead on behalf of the Women's League. Mr. Ellis goes out to France for the third time with the good wishes of every member of the church and school, and with their earnest prayer that he may speedily return to resume his ministerial labours in their midst. During the evening Mr. Ellis presented to the chapel framed photographs of the Revs. Francis Revill, Alex. Ashworth, Wm. Harrison, W. G. Price, W. Short, and of himself. These together with the portrait of the Rev. Joseph Freeston already in the Minister's Vestry, will complete the collection of portraits of ministers who have served at Stalybridge since the foundation of the church.

Wallasey.—The special effort of the Memorial Church congregation during the past few months to raise £500, has resulted, thanks to the generous help of friends in other churches, in a total sum of £414 10s. being realised. Of this about £150 has already been used in paying off the church debt. The cost and scarcity of both labour and material having greatly increased during the period of appeal, it has been decided, for the present, to postpone structural and other work pending a more favourable opportunity. In the meantime a portion of the money has been temporarily invested in £200 of War Loan, leaving a balance of about £60 in hand for immediate requirements.

BIRTH.

PEARSON.—On September 14, the wife of Captain Harold F. Pearson, M.C., of a daughter.

MARRIAGES.

MORRIS—SANFORD.—On September 17, at the Parish Church, Oxhey, by the Rev. J. Tarkyn, Arthur Morris of Newcastle-on-Tyne and Teubryn, Carmarthen, only son of the late Sir Lewis Morris, to Margaret Christina, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. G. A. Sanford of Upland Court, Northwood, and granddaughter of the late Christopher Thomas of Bristol.

RICHARDSON—LOCK.—On September 18, at the Unitarian Church, Wandsworth, by the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, B.A., Arthur Henry Richardson, Pte. 2/23 London Regt., of Clapham, to Leslie May, eldest daughter of Leonard Lock, Birdhurst Road, Wandsworth.

DEATHS.

BROWN.—On September 12, at Lindsay Grange, Branksome Park, Bournemouth, Sarah, beloved wife of George William Brown, aged 67.

EILOART.—On the 9th inst., painlessly, Edith Eiloart, of Glengyle, 3 Chester Road, Bournemouth, aged 66.

OUT OF THE HEART OF THE STORM.

Twelve Sermons preached at Rosslyn Hill Chapel Hampstead, and Manchester College, Oxford.

BY

Rev. HENRY GOW, B.A.

The sermons are written by one who believes with President Wilson that "right is more precious than peace," and that no personal sorrow or loss should discourage us and turn us from our firm resolve to overthrow the Prussian autocracy. They are written too in the growing confidence that faith in God and in the supremacy of Love has become more and not less possible and real through the conflict and agony of recent times.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

All letters and manuscripts for the Editor should be sent to 13 Bream's Buildings, Fetter Lane, London, E.C.4. They must reach the Editor not later than Wednesday morning for publication the same week.

PRINCE COLONNA, who as Syndic of Rome, received London's and England's welcome on Tuesday at the Mansion House, in his address referred to some of the illustrious Englishmen who, as poets or politicians, had in past years warmly cherished his native country. He spoke also of the great reception Garibaldi met with in England; a reception which was full of romance for many an English boy, now wearing the hoar of age. In regard to Mazzini, that profoundly religious man of whom we speak elsewhere, the Prince said: "Our great exile found in [England] security, respect and love, feeding in your land of liberty the sacred fire which should redeem Italy, dreaming midst the poetry of your freedom of an international league of the United States of Europe, which is to-day invoked by President Wilson." Yes, half-a-century and more ago men like Mazzini and Victor Hugo had these dreams; who shall say they will not yet come true?

It is opportune, while Italy is so much in our minds, to remind ourselves of the condition and prospects of liberal religious thought in that country. Seventeen years ago the Rev. Tony André of Florence (in whose charge the Protestant cemetery is in which lie the graves of Theodore Parker and Mrs. Browning), gave a full and careful statement on the subject to the London International Council of Unitarians and others, and the circumstances appear to be much the same to-day, with the exception of a useful amount of organising work done by the late Rev. G. Conte, whose widow carries on the work. There is very little in Italy, we were told, comparable to the movement of religious thought observable in Protestant countries. The religious question is there complicated by the national question, Liberal Catholics, so-called, being opposed to the uncompromising attitude of the Vatican. But Prof. Augusto Conti had said, "In Italy a man is either a Catholic or a Rationalist," and many who boast of their free-thinking attend mass and die as Christians. There has long been boldness of thought and criticism and a weakening of Church ties, but most of this has been due to intellectual causes and a really religious interest is too seldom manifested. La Riforma Italiana, the monthly bulletin of the Italian Association of Liberal Believers, which is now in its seventh year, has proved a useful link between progressives of diverse kinds, and by its Biblical and other articles, as well as translations of English and American publications, it keeps in touch with religious reformers in other lands. Senator Romolo Murri and other Modernists support it, and the two Associations in London and Boston give financial assistance to this propagandist work in the birth-land of the Sozzini.

ONCE more the great north road along the maritime plain of Palestine has seen the hosts of victory advance, and General Allenby's achievement a week ago, with its sequel of gathered spoils, will certainly not be deemed unworthy of a place in the long record of warfare that renders that little tract of land so memorable in human story. The military significance of the latest battle of Samaria, as we see it is called, is great; but, if the policy which has been announced by our Government is carried out as honestly as we believe it has been conceived, its political significance, not only to Palestine but to all neighbouring lands, is the highest possible. While adding our acclaim to the skill, energy, and self-sacrifice by which alone this great exploit has been accomplished, we would remind ourselves that it vastly increases our national responsibilities, and demands from us all the utmost vigilance and fidelity to secure for the East a really new opening of civilisation—a "day of the Lord" indeed.

In little more than twenty-four hours from its setting forth in the track of the Pharaohs, Allenby's cavalry force, in which were British yeomanry, Australian light horse, and Indian squadrons, had traversed the Plain of Sharon, threaded the sand dunes of the coast, crossed the lower heights of Carmel, and pushed forward over the green levels of Esdraelon. Shrewdly leaving the miry valley of the lower Kishon to be dealt with later, when it should be required to seize Haifa and the Bay of Acre, the advanced guards had mounted the Galilean scarp and established themselves—in Nazareth!

* * *

WHO of us at home is not moved to ponder over such an event? But one would give much to know the meditations of thoughtful minds on the spot. Men brought up in the Christian tradition are now as close as locality can ever bring them to the actual life of One who 1900 years ago looked round, day by day, to those very hill-tops. Of so-called "sacred sites," Nazareth (happily) has few of any note, and the impostures are not so glaring as in Jerusalem and its vicinity. Nevertheless, it would be surprising if quiet thinkers were not somewhat deeply affected by the scene—certainly not in the direction that our supernaturalists would desire. Now that they too have trod "those blessed fields," we would hope that our soldiers, not regretting overmuch to be disillusioned—as so many tourists have been—will learn with Whittier to see Holy Land in our own home country.

* * *

WE all watch narrowly the political developments which are taking place in Germany, and read with deep interest the speeches by responsible men which may afford a possible gleam of hope for the nations. Doubtless, we all find it difficult to clear our minds of prejudice; but, if so, the fault lies at the door of those who have taught mankind how little trust is to be placed in Germany's solemn pledges. If the praises of a League of Nations which are now uttered by one and another in that country were but accompanied by signs of practical conduct answerable to the spirit of any such League we should listen with greater satisfaction. As it is, the old tag comes to mind, Timeo Danaos—we may add præsertim fœdera ferentes. Meanwhile the developments go on, and we all watch.

* * *

MR. HAVELOCK WILSON's eager desire to secure the punishment of Germany's guilt, particularly in submarine warfare, is fully paralleled, according to a cable message from New York this week, by the zeal of the Baltimore Baptists in general regard to the criminals who engineered the war. In a solemn convention of their members they deprecated sickly, mawkish, and neurotic sentiment in the matter; and in the name of outraged civilisation and unnumbered victims they urged President Wilson to insist that there shall be no peace "until after the leading criminals have paid with their lives for their fearful offences." It is said that the resolution to this effect was adopted without dissent, and that it is to serve as a model for other churches in the United States. An additional reason for the whole-hearted efforts of their country in the war was found in the fact that for three years, during which she held aloof, her defence against the barbarism of Germany lay with the armies of England, France, and Italy.

* * *

GENERAL reprobation has been expressed in regard to the railway strike this week, but the reprobations uttered, as we know, by the men in the forces are decidedly the most severe. And they well might be. The offence of the strikers is not merely that of grabbing the utmost possible for themselves, whatever the result may be to their neighbours or to the national welfare—others, far too many of them, share that ignoble disposition; and our soldiers, who are getting so little while giving so much, naturally, and we think very justifiably, hurl bitter reproach upon all such. But in the case of the railway strikers there is the added sin against that spirit of discipline and good faith which the men in the ranks have come to realise as the very sap of an army's vitality. Talk about "democracy"—when duly organised unions will not abide by the advice of their own representatives! Evidently there is something for the men at home to learn as thoroughly as they have done who are fighting in our cause abroad.

* * *

THE numerous and highly interesting letters which have been received at Essex Hall from our men in the Forces, in acknowledgment of the third Bulletin which was recently sent to nearly 7,000 of them, are alike touching and greatly reassuring. In many cases the writers express the most grateful feelings for the mere remembrance of friends in the home-land, and their words create a new sense of the loneliness of spirit which they inevitably share, however cheered they may be by letters from their own families. It is especially noticeable how keenly alive our lads are to the more serious and thoughtful pages in the Bulletin, and their alertness to the real questions at issue. There can be no doubt that Lawrence House, in its efforts to keep in touch with our dear fellows abroad, as well as to add some little comfort to them when they are able to visit London, is fulfilling a real ministry.

MAZZINI'S ITALY.

OF the four great names popularly associated in Italy's national rejoicings each is well worthy of commemoration. If to some of us that of Mazzini outshines the rest it is not because we fail to recognise the lustrous services of all in the cause of Italian unity and independence. Cavour the statesman, Victor Emmanuel the ruler, gave in their respective ways quite indispensable aid in the great work of building up and freeing the nationality. Of the splendid character of Garibaldi, a hero as modest as he was brave, and gifted with supreme power to quicken in his followers the patriotic ardour that glowed in his own breast, there is no need to speak here. Fame is not always as trustworthy as when, in her clearest tones, she trumpets the name of the hero of Caprera.

But Giuseppe Mazzini ranks apart. He too fought, but who thinks of him as a soldier? He was a politician, long exercised in the somewhat dubious arts and strategies of party combinations, and for a long time he was credited—or charged—with deep-laid schemes and plots. Yet when all that he attempted, overtly or covertly, in the political world is forgotten or ignored, his name will stand out with a light peculiar to itself. The title of prophet is one which, if men were wise, they would attach to their fellows with less readiness than is sometimes exhibited; but when all is said and done, and when all due abatements are made, we conclude that this man, if any in his century, was of right prophetic rank. And we feel there is no great risk in ranking him with those politicians and publicists of Israel and Judah who began the "goodly fellowship."

For him the nation was more than a political unit. However strenuously he strove to abolish the fatal divisions in territorial authority which left the peninsula defenceless against predatory princes, he had an ideal for his people far above that of mere independence. Believing as he did in liberty he believed also in law, and the supreme law for him was Democratic Brotherhood. The evil of foreign domination, consequent upon the internecine strife between the petty sovereigns of the rival Italian states was hardly worse in his sight than the evil strife itself. He knew well that, apart from the incitement of ambitious governments, earth's common peoples have no bellicose feelings towards each other. He believed that if they could but have their eyes opened to the folly of serving with their limbs and lives the selfish interests of princely families the vast majority of people, the people at large, would gladly ally themselves in work for the common good. To this emancipation of men's minds he gave the full force of his genius.

Among the tyrannies against which he fought the tyranny of the Prince-Pope of Rome was ever prominent. All through his many years of never-resting endeavour he saw in the Vatican priesthood a prime enemy of his nation. It was his good fortune to live long enough to see Rome become once again the capital—a symbol of that civil rule in its own house which Italy had been so long denied. But, as we all know, the soul of Mazzini was not to be contented with dethroning a Pope. The religion that had clothed itself in the vestments of imperialism was, indeed, no religion for him; yet without a religion, profound, earnest, vital, propagandist, he could not live—nor did he imagine a people could live. His prophetic warnings, his appeals to the heart and spirit of men, remain an abiding witness against the levity, of which we see far too much in our own nation—let his speak for itself—the levity that pays outward homage to freedom and right, but too often forgets the duties of righteousness. Mazzini's Italy, we feel, was not to be just one more among a group of powerful competitors for European supremacy; it should be, if he had but power to persuade it, a leader of the way of Brotherhood among the nations. It should be educated in the intellect, cultivated in tastes, diligent in business, upright in conduct; and all this because, as Mazzini intensely believed, one God is Father of all, has given the fertile earth in its beauty to be a happy dwelling-place for man, and will give ever-increasing blessings to them if they will but obey His holy will. So he thought, and so he taught; and pace Mr. Wells, it is a nineteenth-century message worthy of the attention of all nations to-day.

A TEST OF STATESMANSHIP.

Now that the German military autocracy is faced with certain defeat, Allied statesmanship will be put to severe tests. Fortunately, President Wilson has become the great moral leader of the nations waging war for justice and democracy, and his influence and authority will grow. He believes in a new world order; he has a living faith in the far-reaching principles he has so eloquently set forth. But for him many of us would have despaired of Allied leadership, which has too often seemed incapable of getting beyond the arts of war oratory. War is, after all, the failure of statesmanship, and our demand on it now is for wise preparation for an enduring peace.

The real test of statesmanship is its attitude to a League of Nations. Viscount Grey put this view strongly in his pamphlet, and his words will bear repetition: "The idea [of a League of Nations] must be adopted with earnestness and conviction by the Executive Heads of States. It must become an essential part of their practical policy, one of their chief reasons for being or continuing to be responsible for the policy of their States. They must not adopt it only to render lip service to other persons, whom it is inconvenient or ungracious to displease. They must lead, and not follow; they must compel if necessary, and not be compelled."

The statesman who is not equal to the vision of a world in which the right of one nation to murder its neighbours at will has been surrendered, giving place to "a real world-partnership based on the recognition of equal right and established and enforced by a common will," to use Mr. Asquith's words, is a stumbling block and ought to be removed.

The conception of a League of Nations has its roots in the great dictum of Kant that "the notion of a right to go to war cannot be properly conceived as an element in the law of nations." Upon that foundation there must be built the structure of such an association of nations as shall rule out war as the determining factor in the external affairs of States. Hitherto, international law has been at the mercy of the powerful and the aggressive. War has been glorified by the learned, some of whom even wear the livery of the Prince of Peace, and all these have not been Germans. In future we must regard armed conflicts between countries as private war amongst the citizens of civilised communities is now looked upon and dealt with when it occasionally occurs. Security is the pressing need of the world, but the notion that it could be obtained by armaments was always stupid, and the bitter experience of the last four years has exposed its futility with tragic emphasis.

Disarmament is the first word of international reconstruction. It is only a League of Nations that can begin the process with any chance of success when the war is over. It would tackle the problem as a whole and not through limited arrangements which have not the elements of permanency in them. Without a collective agreement, carried out through a central authority, the free creation of most, if not all, the Sovereign States of the world, proposals to reduce armies and navies invariably engender suspicion. A League of Nations would reduce this to a minimum, and soon overcome it altogether. There is something else it could do which has so far been impossible. If any Power was found to be making warlike preparations out of all proportion to its legitimate needs, it could be called upon for explanations, and if these were not considered satisfactory such undue arming would be treated as tantamount to an act of war. Whether it was a case of this kind, or of a deliberate violation of the compact not to resort to arms until there had first been an investigation of the dispute by an impartial tribunal, the use of force, economic or military, is contemplated as an instrument of law, as now obtains in the domestic domain. Such a law would only be a terror to evil doers.

A League of Nations would, of course, be much more than an international policeman. Its functions would, indeed, cover the entire field of international relations. To preserve mankind from the ravages of war would be a great thing, but its task would be a much higher and more difficult one than that. It is nothing less than the enthronement of Public Right. Peace there may be without justice, and then it is but a form of national paralysis. War affords no guarantee of justice. It is not even the fittest who survive its shock. The reign of law in the international sphere would give to the small nation an equality with its more powerful neighbour not possible under the sway of the sword, and this is the essence of equity.

It is for statesmen to work out the details of a League of Nations, and there is now, fortunately, much valuable material accumulated to assist them. It may be freely admitted that many serious difficulties confront them, but they must not shrink from their duty on this account. None of these difficulties are so great as those which face them if the existing anarchy is allowed to continue. Humanity cannot allow itself to be crucified afresh, either by the crimes of autocrats or the failures of statesmen. Alliances cannot be trusted to keep a just peace, special friendships carry with them the seeds of destruction, and no amount of armaments provide security. It is only a League of the Peoples—not of kings—which can make the world safe for democracy and all that that means for the free development of mankind.

DR. WICKSTEED AND HENRY GEORGE.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—When I sent my note in order to contribute a matter of interest, I had to seize the occasion, relying mainly on memory of conversations with Mr. Webster and Dr. Wicksteed several years ago, and hoping that Dr. Wicksteed might correct the version I presented, if necessary—and I am very glad he has done so. With all respect for Dr. Wicksteed's modesty, I submit that these details are of more than personal interest.

It was certainly no part of my intentions to prejudice incidentally land nationalisation or Henry George. I did not think that my version of the story could do so, because Dr. Wicksteed's views are weighty enough to be well known, and, as Dr. Wicksteed himself says, his study of economics has led him far from what was then his position. My impression was that on economic matters other than land nationalisation Dr. Wicksteed set out to refute George. I need hardly say that I am sincerely sorry if my version of the story was capable of doing any harm whatever.

May I point out that, as Dr. Wicksteed implies, To-day was a Socialist organ and the Marxites were challenging. Mr. Bernard Shaw is here the important person, and in the 'History of the Fabian Society,' in Henderson's 'Life of Shaw,' and otherwise, it has been explicitly acknowledged that it was Dr. Wicksteed who was the means of producing a most important change in the history of this country.

What I thought was of interest was that the late Mr. Webster introduced Henry George's 'Progress and Poverty' to Dr. Wicksteed, which was the means of turning Dr. Wicksteed to economics, which was the means of converting the "Fabians" from Marxism.—Yours, &c.,

CIVILISATION AND ENERGY.

ONE aspect of the growth of civilisation is the progressive mastery of man over the energies of nature. From one point of view we may look upon nature as a kind of generating station where enormous energies are produced. Many of these energies, left alone, run to waste: some work destructively: some work for that kind of evolution which we regard as purposive and progressive. Consider, for instance, the energy produced, yet from a mechanical point of view running to waste, in the great waterfalls of the world, in the rising and falling of the tides. Civilised man has begun to realise what great purposes can be fulfilled by controlling, directing and converting these energies. Or again, man is just beginning to recognise the enormous stored up energy in coal. This energy is wasted not merely by leaving the coal in the ground, but by burning coal in millions of houses for cooking and warming. The energies of wind and storm are conspicuous among those which are not merely waste, but destructive. The forces of electricity in the thunderstorm are no doubt fulfilling their function in the universal economy, but from our point of view they are energies destructively directed: so the raging wind that stirs up the ocean to storm, the explosive forces that burst the earth's crust in volcano and earthquake.

To utilise these forces, to minimise or eliminate their destructive power by directing them intelligently, to increase their value by making them do work which makes the world a better place for man to dwell in—these are some of the tasks of civilisation, and tasks which have proceeded a considerable way if we compare the modern with the ancient world. But it is not only nature which is a generating station of energy, and the control and right direction of natural forces is but part of the task of a real and worthy civilisation. Mankind itself is, in a sense, an energy producer: physical, emotional, intellectual, spiritual. And human energies are in as great need of right direction and control as are natural ones. Here, as in nature undirected, there is waste of energy, there is unapplied, and what is worse, misapplied energy. And when we face the problem of the unapplied and misapplied energies of mankind we approach very near to the roots of the fact of sin. We have but to think of individuals and of nations where energies of passion, of intense feeling, of intellect, have been uncontrolled, misapplied, to realise what harvests of evil and suffering, not for themselves alone, are reaped.

Generally speaking energy as such, whether natural or human, is neither good nor bad. It is, so to speak, the raw material out of which good and evil are made. All depends on the direction or misdirection of the energy. Passion, force of intellect, physical power, spiritual sensibility are neither good nor bad until they are directed, until they are in action. Passion and physical power enlisted in the service of a good cause—a cause that is having to do with the welfare of mankind—are good; losing themselves in the wild chaos of selfish gratification and destruction, they are bad. The forces of spiritual life can equally be wrongly directed—towards superstition, isolation, selfishness. All energy of the human being is good if it is rightly controlled and directed: and so the supreme problem of a religious civilisation is to make possible the right use for good ends of human energy.

This is being realised now in the sphere of education. Rightly understood—as the Greeks understood it—education is not concerned merely with the intellectual energies, but with all the energies of the human being. It used to be assumed that children possessed a certain quantity of "animal spirits" that must find vent, whether in play or in mischief (not to mention that youth, male youth at least, must have opportunity of "sowing wild oats"). Therefore some provision had to be made, some outlet left, or connived at, for them to "let off steam," to get rid of "superfluous energy." Scientifically understood there is no such thing as "superfluous energy." It is only energy that we have not learnt to control, direct, utilise that we call "superfluous." Baden Powell initiated a great step in real education when he started the Boy Scouts' Movement: which is simply a scheme to give a sensible and useful direction to vital energies, in such a way as to contribute to character-building and good citizenship.*

Donald Hankey has directed our minds to this problem in relation to the men of our armies in 'A Student in Arms,' especially in the chapter on 'Some who were lost, and afterwards were Found.' He speaks of men whose energies found no place amid the conventions and customs of normal social life. "They were lost; but not necessarily damned. They were lost; but they were not poisonous. That was the trouble. They were so lovable.... They were incurably disreputable, always in scrapes, always impecunious, always improvident.... We could not fit them in, and somehow we felt that this inability of ours was a slur on society. We felt that there ought to be a place for them in the scheme of things.... Then at last we 'got out.' We were confronted with dearth, danger and death. And then they came to their own. We could no longer compete with them.... never was such a triumph of spirit over matter.... With a gay heart they gave their greatest gift, and with a smile to think that after all they had anything to give which was of value."

This one thing is quite clear: there are energies, physical, mental and spiritual, which have long lain dormant or have actually been misdirected into anti-social and destructive ways, which the circumstances of war have stimulated and directed into fine and great activity. It is a serious reflection on the state of our pre-war civilisation and social order that so much power, such splendid human energies were being allowed to run to waste or to work destructively for want of scope and opportunity, or by reason of lack of stimulus and right direction. A root problem of reconstruction is to give scope and provide stimulus and direction to these energies within the fellowship of a society which seeks life more abundant, rich, and varied, rather than the accumulation of material wealth.

It is far easier to be critical and negative than constructive and positive—easier to point out the faults and failings of our social order that have led to the waste of human energy than to suggest the remedy. It will require the earnest thought, the good-natured, tolerant, and sympathetic collaboration of many minds of all sorts of points of view to lay the foundation of a freer and fuller life. But it is well at least to be aware of the problem—aware of it in two very definite aspects: what, as William James asked years ago, is the moral equivalent for war? In other words, how can we secure the scope and provide the stimulus for the healthy and beneficent activity of human energies in peace, for the sake of the common good, to their fullest extent? And, what is the moral equivalent of industrial and commercial competition as we know, or have known it? J. CYRIL FLOWER.

MEMORIAL NOTICE.

MRS. RYMER.

By the death of Mrs. Jane Rymer, in her 86th year, Park Street Church, Hull, has lost one of its oldest and most devoted members. A Sunday school teacher at the age of 12 in the old Bowl-Alley Lane days she was always an ardent supporter of the church and all its activities. Regularly she attended the services week by week, while health and strength permitted, and when infirmity at length imprisoned her at home she never ceased to display her interest and to exercise her gracious influence. A deep fondness for children was perhaps her outstanding characteristic. And this is not to be wondered at, for love was really the keynote of her life. During her last few days the words most often on her lips were, "Thank God, I have always had the power of loving." A friend has said of her, "I do not ever remember hearing her speak an angry word." Owing to the early death of her husband, who left her with a family of little ones, her life was one long tremendous struggle. But no disappointment or sorrow could embitter or subdue her courageous and affectionate nature. Cheerfully she set her face to meet the heavy duties which devolved upon her; and she had her reward. She ended her days blessed with children and grandchildren who surrounded her with affection and honour, staunch supporters of the church she loved and a credit to the town in which they live. It may be said that her religion was her life and her life was a triumph.

THE REV. H. D. ROBERTS.

RECOLLECTIONS AND ANTICIPATIONS.

I speak of one who held there was no break
Twixt human things and those men call divine:
Who'd place round these no narrow boundary line
To shut God's spirit out from earth, and make Men say—"O why should Love and Beauty shake
Our hearts for naught? Why lowly bread and wine
Alone be sanctioned as a Mystic Sign,
Reason be void, and life one long mistake?"

What strange transfigurations by him wrought—
Fresh visions of the soul's unbounded span—
Old problems newly solved—the mind's release—
Who said: "Not Christ's, nor Paul's, nor Buddha's thought
Told all the avenues through which a man May seek, and find, salvation, strength, and peace."

SPEAKING generally, sermons are a class of literature that afford me little pleasure. Possibly I am not alone in this. Pulpit oratory immortalised in print is often as little palatable as are the order of ideas of which it treats when crystallised into doctrine. Yet there are notable—and some (unfortunately) un-notable—exceptions. Often, on picking up a friendly and familiar little book, 'Religion in National and Social Life,' by the Rev. H. D. Roberts, I have found myself wishing to have the opportunity a printed volume would bestow of reading some of his sermons, lectures, and addresses given at Hope Street Church during his ministry there, 1903-1913. Will he, I wonder, ever be tempted to permit some of these to be more than a fragrant memory in the minds of his then hearers and admirers? In some not too remote future—in happier days when the War Office has at length relinquished Mr. Roberts' valuable services—I for one shall hope so. For, if I mistake not, they would in their own way be a genuine contribution to religious literature.

I have the pleasantest recollections of his occupation of the Hope Street pulpit. The first occasion I had the privilege of hearing him was when he delivered a lecture on 'Agnosticism.' Herein was shewn to the full his extraordinary gift of penetrating to the heart of things, and reconciling surface differences. The hearer who thought he differed found himself surprised into unexpected agreements. That the lecturer deemed the agnostic's position a "blind alley" was sufficiently clear, yet the strength and sincerity of his arguments were never for a moment impeached.

From the outset he gave his adversary—if indeed he were such—the fairest of fair play. Indeed it appeared to me as if he went with him intellectually almost all the way: so that I was led to reflect that between agnosticism and this type of religion the difference was small. No doubt, he would not, could not, have conceded this to be the case; but this, his first impression upon me, sufficiently shews how far and deep his conciliatory efforts went; how far (like another great Teacher) he made himself "all things to all men." This impression was only confirmed and heightened as I followed, with keen and pleasurable interest, the remainder of these lectures, which treated of some of the great "world religions." I could only be pleased and gratified to observe that he included in the category of religious thought even Atheism, it being one of the results of a sincere endeavour of the human mind "to account for things." Obviously it must be so included, or it would not be possible to speak of Buddhism as a religion.

His large and dignified tolerance especially commended itself to me in the lecture (of this series), entitled 'A Comparison of Systems.' Here again were no thunders of denunciation: only the most astute critical reflections. The hearer was left to draw his own conclusions—they were not forced upon him. On this occasion I was surprised out of all precedent to hear him read as a "lesson" an extract from Tennyson's 'Dream of Akbar.' The prevailing sentiment of universal toleration pervading this poem formed a fitting text to the succeeding lecture.

* Wm. McDougall has an interesting and valuable section in his 'Social Psychology' on "Play" (ch. iv.), in which he shows that among animals play is a kind of education in the control and direction of energies on whose functioning they will be dependent for their livelihood.

His choice of reading matter for Church usage was such as might have been expected from an earnest and liberal thinker. It may naturally be supposed to indicate his individual characteristics. I rarely heard him read from the fourth gospel: nor—with the exception of the great ode on Love, and a few other passages—from the Pauline literature. His mysticism seemed to me entirely that of a modern mind. Mystifications were not in his way. He appeared to be most fond of certain sayings of Jesus recorded in the synoptics, which he would often read: and, in the Old Testament, of certain of the Psalms and passages from the later Isaiah. He frequently read also from the Scriptures of other nations: from the Hindoo, the Persian, and the Mohammedan writings, and from many modern authors.

His lectures on controversial subjects would, naturally, be of no use whatever to the orthodox Christian, but were of inestimable value to many varieties of seekers dissatisfied with current creeds, metaphysics, and apologies—seekers as much as anything, perhaps, for intellectual comradeship, who found here new and unexpected light in place of illusory clouds and darkness. Whatever subject he touched became instinct with new life.

To know him personally, I found later, is to have all these outward impressions corroborated, and to discover a robust, genial personality to whom one would fearlessly confide the wildest or most revolutionary schemes and speculations, knowing that they would receive fair treatment. He is entirely free from the ultra-seriousness and official solemnity which seem inseparable from so many of the clergy. No merely intellectual proposition overturning old landmarks ever shocked him. It is social evils—like the evil of sweated labour—that have called forth his indignation, and against which he has not only preached but worked.

In a wandering essay like the present it is not possible to give more than hints and suggestions of his personal magnetism: of his firm intellectual grip of things, his astute critical insight, his large humanity, his winning sociability and sense of humour, and withal his intense idealism, his earnest conviction of the goodness hidden in all things, and his power of discovering and presenting it. With the subtle atmosphere of "Other Worldliness" that pervades most types of Christianity he has no sympathy. For him the Kingdom of Heaven is here and now: its denizens real men and women living in a real world of splendour and beauty. "The Kingdom of Heaven is within you" is one of his most frequent quotations from the New Testament. He has drawn no hard and fast line between things "sacred" and "secular." The kingdom of the Spirit can be entered by many doors. Morality—"mere morality"—is by no means distinct and separate from true "religion." The moral man is in his own right most truly a religious man.

If religious teaching be divided roughly into two classes, one authoritative the other persuasive: one supernatural (by which term anti-natural must here be meant), and the other humanitarian; then the whole spirit of Mr. Roberts's utterances is at once seen to belong to the latter order. His rôle, may I say, has been that of a modern Prometheus who takes Heaven's fire for man's service. It is for this reason that I hope one day to handle a volume—just a small volume—of his sermons and addresses on various subjects.

NOTES ON SOME RECENT BOOKS.

Whittaker (Thomas). THE NEO-PLATONISTS: A STUDY IN THE HISTORY OF HELLENISM; with appendix, and supplement on The Commentaries of Proclus. Cambridge University Press, i.-xv, 1-318 pp. 12s. n.

Since the first edition of this work was issued, the publication of improved texts has enabled the author to "do more justice to the thought of Proclus" than was possible formerly, and the supplement constitutes, therefore, a valuable addition to an important work. The appendix on Gnosticism has been rewritten in view of recent research.

The Teaching Office of the Church: BEING THE REPORT OF THE ARCHBISHOPS' FIRST COMMITTEE OF INQUIRY with appendices. Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge. 178 pp., 2s. n.

One of a series of five reports which are the outcome of the National Mission of two years ago.

Rimington (Prof. Alexander W.). THE CONSCIENCE OF EUROPE—THE WAR AND THE FUTURE. London, Allen & Unwin. i.-ix, 179 pp., 3s. 6d. n.

Prof. Rimington is in full agreement with those who believe that before any permanent results of a League of Nations can be achieved there must be a radical change in the heart of man. He attempts in these pages to clear our vision, and help us towards that balanced judgment which is lacking in so many quarters.

Mason (E. Williamson). MADE FREE IN PRISON; with appendices. London, Allen & Unwin. i.-ix, 212 pp., 2s. 6d. n.

A collection of letters from a Conscientious Objector, who is, apparently, still in prison, describing to a friend his experiences and the emotions they awaken. The letters were written without the least reserve, or thought of publication, and are very human. Mr. Edward Carpenter has supplied an introductory note.

Montefiore (Claude G.), M.A. THE PLACE OF JUDAISM AMONG THE RELIGIONS OF THE WORLD. London, The Lindsay Press. 61 pp., 1s. 6d. n.

A reprint of Mr. Montefiore's Essex Hall Lecture, which was delivered at Whitsuntide, and reported in our columns. He believes that Judaism, as "a rich and positive," and moreover a "growing Theism," has a distinct place in the world, and a future of development before it.

Newlyn (Herbert N. G.). THE RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN THE MYSTICAL AND THE SENSIBLE WORLDS. London, Allen & Unwin. 128 pp., 4s. 6d. n.

A brief but suggestive survey of various fields of thought from which intimations of "super-phenomenal experience" may be gleaned. The author seeks to stimulate interest in the findings of science no less than of religion in this connection, and approaches a great subject in a modest and earnest manner.

The Unitarian Faith in Unitarian Hymns; compiled by W. Copeland Bowie. London, The Lindsay Press. i.-vii., 56 pp., 1s. 6d. n.

At the end of this little book is a statement of Unitarian beliefs, of which the beautiful hymns which form the collection are intended as expositions. Taken together, the statement and the hymns should do much to remove the mistaken view which is still largely held, as Mr. Bowie says, that Unitarianism is "a somewhat hard and rationalistic type of theology, lacking altogether in religious fervour." The biographical notes are very useful and add considerably to the interest of the book.

Wiert (N. Carton de). THE WAY OF HONOUR. London, Allen & Unwin. 256 pp., 5s. n.

A collection of speeches made by the Belgian Minister of Justice in the early months of the war. It deals vividly and enthusiastically with the causes of the great aggression of 1914, the Belgian soldier, the endurance of the people of Belgium, the roots of nationality, and the rights of nations. The last 70 pages, which discuss various 'Sights and Lessons of the War,' are perhaps the most interesting part of the book.

PAMPHLETS.

THE NEW GRAVEL PIT CHURCH, HACKNEY.

250th ANNIVERSARY.

Two hundred and fifty years ago, in a few old cottages knocked together to form a meeting house, a small band of Protestant Dissenters met together for worship under the leadership of silver-tongued Dr. Bates, the ejected friend of Tillotson and other eminent personages of the day. On Sunday last, September 22, their spiritual descendants, the congregation of the New Gravel Pit Church, Hackney, did honour to their memories.

In those two hundred and fifty years many things have happened which have influenced and have been influenced by that small body of men and women. The long list of illustrious men who have served the congregation as its ministers can be equalled by few, if any, Nonconformist churches in this land. Bates, Belsham, Price, Priestley, Matthew Henry, Robert Aspland, are names to conjure with in the history of the fight for civil and religious liberty in this country; and in more recent years, J. T. Whitehead, Fletcher Williams, Henry Rawlings, and that grand old veteran, still happily amongst us, T. L. Marshall. Others there were also deserving of honoured remembrance, and their names can be read in the excellent little history of the congregation written by Mr. Whitehead and added to by his daughter, to which Dr. Herbert Smith so appreciatively referred at last Monday's meeting. (Price 1s., by post 1s. 2d. This can be had on application to the Church Secretary.) Some maintain that there are traces of a dissenting congregation meeting in earlier days still; it may be so. By 1668 the congregation is known to have been in existence, and in two hundred and fifty years a great tradition can have been produced.

After worshipping for some years in the cottages in Mare Street, for sufficient reasons the Gravel Pit Meeting House was erected in Paradise Fields—real fields just off the main road, with a stream hard by, and almost under the shadow of the Parish Church erected by the Knight Templars. For nearly a century this was their religious home, till the lease fell in and the ground landlords (St. Thomas' Hospital) refused to renew to so heretical a sect—not altogether unnaturally, perhaps, in view of the experience of Joseph Priestley.

A new site was found a few hundred yards away in the same road, and for another century the Old Gravel Pit Church and the New existed almost side by side. Now, unhappily, the rising generation is being encouraged to forget these old traditions, for the Old Gravel Pit Mission has removed to a neighbouring street, and what was the Gravel Pit Meeting House is now St. Luke's Institute.

For the last hundred and ten years the congregation has been housed on its present site. The existing building was opened in 1858, the former one having become dangerous. The school premises are a few years older, with the exception of Aspland Hall, erected in 1913-14. The present church is one of the most beautiful in the denomination, and is surrounded by a graveyard which is worthy of the serious attention of the Unitarian Historical Society. It is the oldest Unitarian graveyard in London, and within its walls rest the mortal remains of many noble members of our household of faith. Alas! the weather is leaving its marks on many of the headstones: had the times been happier this would have been a fitting opportunity for appealing to the families interested to preserve the inscriptions for the benefit of future generations.

Tempora mutantur. Hackney is no longer a village. It is not even a fashionable suburb. The population has increased but subscriptions have not. Yet the work is being carried on in the same spirit that breathed in our forefathers, and the new era that opened on Sunday last promises to be as illustrious and fruitful of good works as the first two centuries and a half.

Large congregations assembled on Sunday to worship in the home of their childhood—in the morning there were scarce half-a-dozen present who were not at some time regular attenders—and listened to the discourses of their former Minister, the Rev. R. H. U. Bloor (1899-1904), in the morning, and Dr. Carpenter in the evening, friends from Newington Green and Islington helping in the choir; while several of the neighbouring schools were represented in the afternoon at the service conducted by the Rev. Gordon Cooper. To summarise a sermon in a sentence is an impertinence: suffice it to say that those who were privileged to be present at those services and at the Monday meeting went away feeling inspired by a new call to loyalty and to service which will leave its mark on the work of school and congregation for years to come.

PUBLIC MEETING.

On Monday evening a meeting was held at 7.30, the present minister of the church, the Rev. Bertram Lister, presiding, in the absence of Mr. J. S. Harding (Treasurer) who was unfortunately unable to get away from his military duties. The Rev. A. H. Dolphin, of Lewisham, offered prayer, and the Chairman read letters of apology from the Mayor of Hackney, and Mrs. Wooding, who were prevented from attending. Other friends of the congregation, including the Rev. John Mark, who was minister of a church at Hackney sixty-five years ago, had also sent apologies for absence. It was agreed that a message of affectionate greeting should be sent to the Rev. T. L. Marshall, formerly Editor of THE INQUIRER, who occupied the pulpit at Hackney from 1853 to 1857, and is now living in retirement at Exeter. Representatives of various societies, and friends in the neighbourhood who were present in addition to the regular members of the congregation, were cordially welcomed.

Dr. Herbert Smith, who conveyed the congratulations of the London District Unitarian Society, of which he is President, gave an interesting address, in the course of which he referred frequently to the admirable 'Historical Sketch' compiled from discourses by the Rev. J. T. Whitehead (minister of the church from 1870 to 1891), and reprinted in October, 1909, for the centenary celebrations. This little book, to which some notes relating to her father's ministry, and to his successors in the pulpit, were added by Miss Lucy Whitehead, contains one of the most interesting chapters in the history of Unitarianism, and Dr. Herbert Smith reminded his hearers that such a record ought not only to make them very proud of the past, but ought to prove a great incentive for the future. The names of three notable men stood out in those pages. Dr. Bates of "the silver tongue" was the first—a very learned and eloquent man who had been appointed to one of the richest livings in London, but came out with the rest of the 2,000 clergy who made such a great stand for liberty of conscience after the passing of the Act of Uniformity. The second was Dr. Price, whose influence extended far beyond his own country, and who actually reversed the policy of the Government of his day in regard to the Sinking Fund, for the re-establishment of which he had pleaded in a book dealing with Annuities. Dr. Price, whose arguments were violently opposed in many quarters, became a noted man, and the friend of some of the most eminent personalities of his day, but aroused considerable hostility in 1775, when he defended the American Rebellion, and again in 1789, when he most enthusiastically supported the French Revolution. It is a remarkable testimony to his strength of character and his intellectual brilliancy that in 1778 he was invited, by a resolution of Congress, to "consider himself as a citizen of the United States," and to go over and assist America in regulating her finances, and, further, that on hearing of his death in 1791, the French National Assembly made honourable mention of him, and no fewer than three million people in France (apart from the patriotic societies which remembered him gratefully) went into mourning for him. Dr. Priestley's name is, perhaps, better known among Unitarians. As a man of science he achieved great things under most serious disadvantages, as Professor Huxley stated at the unveiling of his statue in Birmingham in 1874, but his "theological heresies" had exposed him to such bitter persecution that it was, undoubtedly, an act of courage and faith on the part of the Old Gravel Pit congregation (as it then was) to invite him to their pulpit in succession to Dr. Price. This act also testified to their remarkable liberality of thought, for whereas Dr. Price was an Arian, Dr. Priestley was a declared Unitarian, and of an advanced type for that period. The Old Gravel Pit Church was, as a matter of fact, the first avowedly Unitarian Church established in London. An interesting passage in the 'Historical Sketch' referred to deals with Dr. Priestley's friendship with Mr. Belsham, an orthodox Independent and a Professor of Divinity, who, from being convinced that the arguments for Unitarianism were of a "superficial texture," found himself obliged to accept them, and to resign various appointments which he could no longer hold in consequence of his change of views. He, too, became a minister of the Gravel Pit Church, succeeding Dr. Priestley, and was, subsequently, the minister of Essex Street Chapel. Various men well known in the Unitarian movement have served the cause at Hackney since those memorable days, and the tradition which they have helped to uphold and to which they have added fresh lustre is in all respects an inspiring one.

Mr. F. D. Bowles, J.P., C.C., spoke in encouraging terms, both as President of the Sunday School Association and as an old member of the congregation, of the effective work which had been done in Hackney ever since the congregation was founded two-and-a-half centuries ago. They must, he said, have the most unbounded admiration for those old dissenters of a bye-gone age, who had risked pains and penalties which were no light matter in order to worship God as their hearts and consciences dictated. He himself looked forward to the time when the liberalising influence of their movement would have gone so far that those who held the Unitarian faith would be able to take part in the worship of the Church of England and not be cut off from the larger body of Christian worshippers.

Councillor the Rev. J. Hillman, who introduced himself as a Baptist, referred in a cordial and sympathetic speech to the warm friendship which he had entertained for Mr. Whitehead, Mr. Green, and Mr. Alfred Clarke, and which he also felt for Mr. Lister, the present minister. It gave him the greatest pleasure to stand on that platform and testify to the good work which they had done. As a minister of more than fifty years' standing he had noticed many changes in regard to religion, and he would sum them up generally under three headings: First, a new conception of the Fatherhood of God had sprung up. Whereas formerly it was the Kingship and Rulership of God which had been most emphasised, a more tender and human tone was now adopted. Secondly, instead of dwelling so much on the fact of the depravity of man, the dignity of man was now more commonly alluded to, and it was recognised that every one was created in the image of God. Thirdly, there had arisen a new idea of duty which was full of promise, and had resulted in work being done for the good of humanity such as had been undertaken in connection with that church. Such work, wherever it was done, was acceptable to God.

The Rev. T. P. Spedding, Mr. Hammond, and Mr. Cornish also spoke, and in a few concluding remarks Mr. Lister suggested, with the approval of all present, that they should send a message of love, and their good wishes, to the men at the front.

MR. G. G. ARMSTRONG, in an address delivered on Sunday afternoon to the Union Chapel Brotherhood, Manchester, on the subject of 'Brotherhood and Dogma,' drew attention to the action of the Manchester Council of Christian Congregations in excluding from its membership two Unitarian congregations. As the constitution of the Council provided for the membership of "every congregation that desires to be represented," he thought the Executive had no authority for their attempt to limit the inclusiveness of the organisation by a doctrinal test. A meeting of the Council was held on September 23, when Principal Graham moved that all congregations who used the Christian name should be admitted to the Union. In his speech he took the broad ground that Christian experience was the one common reality, and urged that power over sin, the practice of helpful prayer, and the consciousness of the guiding power of God were the experiences on which varying and contradictory creeds had been built. An amendment by Miss Mackintosh to the effect that the Council should be open to all who desired to subscribe to the objects set out in the constitution—bodies sharing a mutual faith and resources according to the light of Christ and under the experience of the Holy Spirit—was accepted by Mr. Graham, and the Rev. F. J. Leggatt (Congregational) who supported the motion. The Rev. H. D. Lockett (Anglican) also supported this plea, but in the end the resolution was defeated by 35 votes to 28. A considerable number abstained from voting.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Acton.—The literary society in connection with the Unitarian Church opens its fifteenth session on Tuesday, October 1, with a lecture by the Rev. Gardner Preston on James Anthony Froude. The society having carried on through the tragic times of the last four years is anxious to persevere to the end. The meetings are held fortnightly during the winter months and a hearty welcome is extended to all friends in the vicinity of the church. Programmes will be forwarded on application to the Secretary, 62 Julian Avenue, Acton, W.3.

Birmingham.—On Sunday, September 22, the services at the Church of the Messiah were conducted by the Rev. Frederic H. Kent of Grafton, Mass., who is in England in connection with the United States Y.M.C.A. In the morning he gave a stirring address on 'The Price of Freedom,' in which he pointed out that "the dramatic challenge of Christ to the Scribes and Pharisees related in Matthew xxiii., was an epitome of the whole struggle for human freedom." After referring to some of the great fights for freedom which history records, Mr. Kent said: "This is not a new war. It is a campaign in a war that has endured for centuries, pausing at times from very exhaustion, only to flame up as either side renewed its strength. Its battles have been fought on many fields and for variously named objectives, but always between the same principles and seeking the same goal. It is the war in which America was born, and in which she preserved her Unity. Its goal is the goal she has always sought. But whereas two thousand years ago a solitary man challenged firmly seated powers and went to his death, to-day twenty nations deliver a stern mandate to the circumscribed and dwindling force of the foe. In the conviction that this war is the continuation of the struggle of the past, the soul of America has vowed that it shall be the last campaign. We are paying blood tribute to autocracy for the last time. We will be free, and since we can be free only when all the world is free, we have resolved to pay now, once and for all, the price of our liberty. We have solemnly resolved that we will not lay down our arms until the goal is attained. It is this resolve that is bringing Americans across the sea by millions, and will keep them here until the spirit of autocracy is left no inch of ground from which to launch a new attack. We know now the price of our freedom, and we will pay."

Hull.—The meeting referred to last week to establish a committee in the town to diffuse the ideal of a League of Nations was held on Saturday. The Rev. Dr. Kirtlan, Wesleyan, presided. A resolution appointing a representative Council of twenty-five members, moved by the Rev. T. M. Falconer, was unanimously adopted. The Right Hon. W. H. Dickinson, chairman of the League of Nations Society, expressed much gratification at this independent effort in that great community.

London: Pioneer Preachers.—At a meeting of the Committee of the Pioneer Preachers held at the Hostel, 23 Highbury Place, London, N., on Monday, September 23, the following resolution was unanimously adopted: "That in accepting with sincere regret the resignation of the Rev. T. P. Spedding, on account of his removal to Mansfield, the Committee place on record their high appreciation of his great devotion to the Pioneer Preachers Movement since its transfer to the Unitarian Association by the Rev. R. J. Campbell, and their gratitude to him for the excellent services he has rendered as honorary secretary and superintendent of the Hostel during the past six years." We understand that the Rev. J. A. Pearson was appointed secretary and superintendent of the Hostel.

Mottram.—The Rev. H. Bodell Smith, minister of the Unitarian Church, during his holiday in the Isle of Man has conducted services for the Primitive Methodists at Port Erin and Port St. Mary, where he is known as a Unitarian.

Padiham.—The Rev. J. H. Ewbank, who has been minister of the Unitarian Church at Swinton since 1916, has accepted an invitation to become minister of Nazareth Unitarian Chapel.

Scarborough.—A cordial welcome was given to the Rev. Thomas Paxton, now Minister of the Westborough Church, on Wednesday, September 18, at a meeting presided over by Mr. S. G. Foster. An excellent musical programme was carried out, and the speakers included the Rev. W. Gibson (also a minister newly appointed to Scarborough), Mr. G. H. Harling, and Mr. F. Booth (Secretary of the local Temperance Union). Mr. Paxton, with whose active work in Bradford, especially in connection with the Khaki Club, readers of THE INQUIRER are familiar, said in the course of his reply that his ideal was a great, big, helping fellowship. He wished to increase the spirit of reverence and worship, to act as a leader among them without any "clerical pretensions," and, with his church, to take a full share of all the duties and responsibilities of their time and town.

Swinton.—The Rev. J. H. Ewbank, B.A. B.D., terminates his ministry at Swinton on Sunday, October 27.

Wigan.—The Rev. H. Fisher Short is resigning the pulpit at Park Lane Chapel at the end of March, in order to take up duty as minister of Bootle Free Church.

 Secretaries of churches which publish Calendars are requested to send the Calendars regularly, and as soon as possible after publication, to the Editor.

 THE INQUIRER welcomes items of news likely to be of special interest to its readers, and is ready to pay for such news when accepted by the Editor, the scale depending upon its importance and suitability in form and matter for insertion. All contributions should be addressed to the Editor, INQUIRER Office, 13 Bream's Buildings, London, E.C.4, and should be received not later than the first post on Wednesday morning in each week.

MARRIAGE.

KITSON—WALKER.—On Sept. 21, at St. Mark's Church, Harrogate, by the Rev. A. Victor Jones, M.A., Vicar of Haworth, York, brother-in-law of the bridegroom, assisted by the Rev. W. Y. Potter, M.A., Vicar, Alan Kenedy, Captain, A.S.C., youngest son of F. C. Kitson, Gardenhurst, Headingley, Leeds, to Irene Clarice, youngest daughter of the late Henry Walker, of Valley House, Headingley, Leeds. Present address: 24 Norfolk Road, Harrogate.

DEATH.

SHAEN.—On September 23, at Crix Cottage, Binfield, after much suffering most patiently borne, Agnes Elizabeth Shaen, younger daughter of the late William and Emily Shaen of 15 Upper Phillimore Gardens, in her 62nd year.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

All letters and manuscripts for the Editor should be sent to 13 Bream's Buildings, Fetter Lane, London, E.C.4. They must reach the Editor not later than Wednesday morning for publication the same week.

IN the nation's rejoicing, deep rather than loud, over the wonderful series of victories recently gained, in Palestine, Bulgaria, and on the Western front, there will be special congratulations to the little peoples, Serbia and Belgium, whose sons have so brilliantly fought to free their respective countries. At the same time grateful admiration goes out towards our French and American allies, who are emulating each other in dash and tenacity, despite the fact that the former have had four years of it and the latter are new to the field. As for our own lads, including among them, as we are proud to do, those from the Britains oversea, no words can do justice to their pluck and swerveless resolution. They had their "backs to the wall," as Sir Douglas Haig put it, six months ago; to-day they are smashing through the "impregnable" lines of the enemy with the same self-possessed confidence and grim cheer as they showed in face of his most terrific onslaughts. The enemy is still capable of powerful resistance; but his capacity to attack is broken. He made his gambler's last plunge in the spring; but, as Sophocles said long ago, it is the gods whose dice have "lucky throws," and one had better be humbly on their side than boast that they are on his.

BEFORE the war the Archbishop of Canterbury took a prominent part in the efforts of the churches in this country and Germany to promote such an amity between the respective peoples as should avert the outbreak of hostilities. Some of us remember the cordial welcome which he gave to Dr. Harnack as a scholar whose writings were everywhere received with deep attention among us; and the reply made by the Berlin University Rector was certainly not lacking in cordiality. We have all travelled far in many ways since those days, Dr. Harnack farthest, as it appears to us—much farther in blindness to the rights of the case than we could once have believed possible. As for the Archbishop, it is gratifying to note how heartily and unreservedly he adheres to the idea of the League of Nations, and how confidently, in response to President Wilson's speech, he pledges the support of religious people on this side. His words are evidently intended to be taken as much more than a personal expression, and we quote them with the assurance that many readers will endorse the opinion and the resolve which they embody.

"I CAN speak for no Government," says Dr. Robertson, "but I am convinced that the mass of thoughtful Christian folk in England feel with an earnestness beyond words the force of his contention that for reasons, not of policy but of principle, not of national interest but of righteousness and justice and enduring peace, we want a League of Nations on the very lines which he has drawn. Details there may be in his description which need elucidation or development, but his outline has our unhesitating support. We are not afraid of such items of self-surrender as may here and there be involved for this nation or that. The issues are world-wide. Our vision and our purpose must be world-wide too."

"LET Mr. Wilson rest assured," he continues, "of the vivid and eager response which his appeal awakens in the minds of tens of thousands of the Christian men and women upon whose will, in the long run, the effective decision must turn. The churches in our land have spoken with no uncertain voice. The responsible vote of our Bishops, given eight months ago, was deliberate and unanimous. We not merely welcomed in the name of the Prince of Peace the idea of such a League, but we desired that provision for it should be included in the conditions of settlement when it comes. Other churches agreed or followed suit. We have not spoken lightly or without assurance of the width and warmth of the support on which we count. We give no mere lip-adherence to a great ideal. We mean that the thing shall come to pass."

THE references made to the Rev. W. H. Drummond's services as minister in the South-Eastern Province will, we know, be read with hearty concurrence not only in this district, but throughout our circle, in which he has rendered many valuable services, literary and administrative, as well as ministerial. The kind response made to his appeal for an Equipment Fund for the Huts where he is now serving in turn thousands of our soldiers, is undoubtedly a testimony of the high personal regard in which he is held. It is for that reason, as well as for the sake of the good work itself, that we remind his friends once more of the Fund. Special reasons will necessitate closing it two weeks hence; will intending donors, therefore, send as promptly as possible to the Rev. W. G. Tarrant at this office.

IN a remarkable 'Open Letter to the Unknown Who holds the Power in Germany,' which The Times is publishing, the writer, Prof. G. F. Nicolai, late of Berlin University, says that "thousands, even millions," of the best of his countrymen secretly share his feelings, and that "there is nothing in the whole world they so ardently desire as that those who control Germany's destinies to-day may fail [italics his] to achieve any lasting power, and that our military power may find itself balked of its disastrous victory both at home and abroad." At the same time he admits that these secret feelings have not hitherto prevented a public support, in the press and the legislature, of the votes of credit which enable the tyranny now existing in Germany to continue. And, referring to the enormous power wielded by their "military Government," which can terrorise or corrupt freely, he speaks of "the obvious and inevitable cowardice of the great majority of people." Who his "Unknown" may turn out to be is beyond conjecture, but he says "assuredly" it is neither the Chancellor nor the Emperor. The question that most matters to us is how many of his countrymen share Prof. Nicolai's liberal opinions.

It behoves all earnest people to take as full a part as they can in what Mr. Asquith, at Manchester last week, described as "an evangelic preparation" for the League of Nations. A large amount of feeling favourable to the project exists, but it has to be much increased and instructed, and focussed on the practical steps to be taken. We must not be surprised if, in common with all kinds of evangelicism, there should arise differences of opinion as to these, indeed such differences have already appeared. In President Wilson's fine re-statement of America's aims emphasis was laid on the desirability of fixing the right moment for the creation of such a League, and in his judgment that moment would be at the Peace Conference that must follow the close of hostilities. Others, with whose feeling we have much sympathy, hold that meanwhile it would be well to draw all "Free Nations" together into a declared union for the purposes contemplated by the League. Against this proposal it has been urged, not unreasonably, that this would tend to render those who would be left out, at first, so suspicious of those who were included that the whole idea would be prejudiced.

* * *

BUT if we all wait till an indisputable proposition is made we run the risk of getting nothing done at all. Surely, as in so many things in this world, we shall do well to begin where we are, to take advantage of the fact that a large group of nations are already on good terms with one another, linked together in a common aim, and sharing good fortune and ill with one another. We strongly commend, therefore, the weighty appeal of the "League of Free Nations Association," now in circulation, and to be had from the head office, 22 Buckingham Gate, S.W.1. As its title denotes, the Association definitely follows President Wilson's lead, and its "general declaration" insists that as "no autocratic government could be trusted to keep faith within it or observe its covenants," no place for "a militarist, autocratic Germany" could be found in the League they wish to see established; only a "liberalised and democratised Germany" could be accepted. We are informed that "the League of Nations Society," of which Sir W. H. Dickinson is Chairman and to which many of our friends belong, is likely to amalgamate with "the League of Free Nations Association," amongst whose leaders are Prof. Gilbert Murray, Mr. J. A. Spender, and Mr. H. G. Wells.

* * *

CLOSE attention was deservedly given by the Southern Provincial Assembly last week to the masterly address of Dr. Jacks on his scheme of International Insurance, which, he urges, would give the League of Nations a piece of immediate work to do, the need and value of which, if done, would be of the highest. On another page readers will find a brief indication of the scope and purpose of the proposal; we hope soon to present them with an article in which Dr. Jacks will set it forth fully in his own words. We understand that great interest is being roused by the addresses which he is giving on the subject to different groups of thoughtful people.

THESE GREAT DAYS.

WHEN we dared to hope that the first sheaf of September's victories might be followed by others—daring not without some hesitation, so often has hope been deferred—we could little guess what the full harvest of the month would be. Since then the days have marched with the foot-fall of destiny. Each, almost, has had its own story of great doings to add to the record; and now that record stands completed, to blaze with matchless light down all corridors of history to come. We have been, and are, living through a time that, if we but understand it aright, must speak to our inmost souls.

"Victory upon victory," has been the phrase that as the month grew to its fulness came daily to the lips of men in our land, in many lands. In many homes, God knows, the cost of the victories has been counted, and aching hearts have suffered, and lonely hearts will go on paying the price through the years to come. But if it be really victory, a triumph of Liberty over Tyranny, of Civilisation over Barbarism, of sane Humanity over the ravaging Beast, our suffering will not be quite unendurable. Now is the hour to recall the nation's highest moods, to re-live them, so that we may be strong to bear not the pain alone, but a more searching test. The price we pay is enormous, frightful. What is it we are purchasing? A "Peace" that will be no peace? A season's indulgence of exultation, to be followed by a renewal, even in worse forms, of the horrors that have made the world desolate so long? Ah, no doubt there will be exultation; there will be inevitable thrills of deep-down satisfaction, elemental, not to be argued or preached away, thrills of a strange yet native temper that must have its way for a time. We have been too deeply injured, outraged, to be able to accept placidly the deliverance that is coming. If manhood has found itself anew in these times, as we know well it has, the discovery has included a vast, surging, unreasoning tide within us of that force, which takes on different aspects, now of rage, now of ruthless courage, now of unswerving determination, by the side of which the strength of steel is as nothing. Yes; in good time, if not quite yet, we shall know what "triumph" is.

And then, if the time be good indeed, we shall not be submerged by this flood from the upwelling spiritual fountain that has been unsealed in us by the war, and which—soon we trust—will emerge into the light of a splendid consummation. Already, if we mistake not, these great days of victory, these greater days of expectation, have heightened the whole of existence for many a soul among us. Through what awful experiences soever we have passed, we begin at last to perceive a meaning in them all. Had it been possible that the diabolical aims that kindled this war were to prove victorious then, indeed, the faith of man must have been crushed. We have long endured as seeing the invisible; but now we begin to see. The end is not yet; we must still strive, still endure. But we are in these days like storm-tossed travellers on the sea, who have again and again with agonising wistfulness searched in vain the horizon, who have been again and again deceived by too sanguine guesses, and who almost fearing still lest they be once more deceived, do at last in very truth catch sight of land. We cannot tell, as yet, how far away we are; but there is "land ahead." The end is coming.

So now let us take the great days with great minds. Let us gather up our energies to our several tasks, and, so far from slackening effort, now if never before let us earn some part, not negligible, of their reward who shall have won this victory for earth and man. Above all, let there be the mood of great thanks to the men who have fought our battles, secured our lives, and by their gallant fortitude given us a new revelation of our race. In that measure of privation which we may have to undergo let there be also the high mood of cheery wonder that we have still so much to enjoy. In our reticent way we are less likely to err in too vocal an expression of our emotions towards God than in too complete silence. But if these days greatness as we humbly think they are meant to do, we shall be strengthened to rejoice in the Eternal Goodness that cannot be defeated, either by our enemy's badness or our own. As a nation we have tried to serve that Goodness; be it unto us as we have tried with all sincerity and truth.

SOME IMPRESSIONS OF HOLLAND IN WAR TIME.

THERE are, I suppose, three aspects of Holland in war-time which may be of interest to the general reader: (1) the prisoners of war; (2) the attitude of Holland towards us; and (3) the development of Y.M.C.A. work there as compared with that of France, England, and elsewhere. I cannot write from any expert experience in any one of these aspects, but only from impressions gained while lecturing for the Y.M.C.A. and Red Cross for nearly two months spent in parts of the Netherlands from which I have recently returned.

I. THE PRISONERS OF WAR.

These are of three groups, a very small section who were part of the Antwerp group of the naval detachment and who escaped directly into Holland after a few hours of war had been experienced and were never made German prisoners; a group about the same size, also of the naval detachment, who were taken prisoners by the Germans and have been in Germany as prisoners for considerable periods of time (these two groups together only amount to a few hundreds); and lastly, much the largest body, composed of a few hundred commissioned and a few thousand non-commissioned officers, mostly of the old army, who fought during the early weeks of war and have all been German prisoners. There are also a stray airman or two and a few civilian prisoners and some colonials.

The real interest of the problem of the prisoners of war in this area is due to the difficulty of harmonising the needs of our interned sailors and soldiers with the requirements of military secrecy and sending food and other materials to them which might be of advantage, and leak over the Dutch border, to the enemy. Holland is a centre for German, French, and British as well as American spies, consequently no literature can go to Holland that might be of service to Germany.

Here, then, is the real difficulty; our sailors and soldiers need mental as well as bodily employment and need both badly, and there has been a splendid opportunity missed in not catering to these needs much earlier. The Government is certainly to blame for not having done so, as the prisoners rightly feel they have been neglected. But to send over lecturers, equipment for general and industrial training, books and some additional food, and really to prepare our prisoners for after-war conditions without at the same time letting Germany into our schemes is not a simple matter.

In spite, however, of the fact that so little has been done until recently for our men, there is a fine cheerfulness present amongst them, and a real appreciation of efforts now being made, though the desire to get back to "Blighty" is naturally a very strong one.

II. HOLLAND'S ATTITUDE.

Holland is uncomfortably situated between the devil and the deep sea. There are no barriers of any serious nature between it and Germany and a German army could probably easily march across Holland in a few days. It is very difficult, therefore, for so small and unprepared a country to resist German demands, but we cannot supply Holland with coal or any other raw, manufactured or food material if these enable Germany to draw more largely on Dutch resources. It is not, therefore, to be expected that the Netherlands population can feel exactly pleased with either the German or the British-American attitudes, though Holland, like most neutral countries, has profited largely by the war. But I think it may be said that apart from the discomfort of the situation the Dutch are steadily learning to like our soldiers better, and to respond more to British character, and growing more apprehensive of Germany. But there is a large section in Holland that would not be averse to seeing their country part of the German Empire.

III. THE Y.M.C.A. AND RED CROSS WORK.

The Y.M.C.A. is exceptionally well organised here, and when one considers the numerous, efficient and very well situated huts at The Hague and at other centres, it says much for its organiser, Mr. Dennis, and those who have helped him, that the work has all been set going since November last. In Mr. Bailey there is now an efficient Director of Studies who is in close supervising touch with the Red Cross, which thus very sensibly co-operates in a joint educational effort.

To sum up, Holland in war-time is at present of interest primarily because of its British prisoners, who need, firstly, occupation of mind and mental employment to help them over the tedium of weary months and years of waiting; it is secondarily of interest because these prisoners and those British who are working for these prisoners will, we hope, do much to help Holland to understand the British character; thirdly, the chief source by which these two ends can be achieved is through the joint action of the Y.M.C.A. and the Red Cross. And though our Government has awakened late to Holland's needs, it is better late than never, and one hopes everything will now be done to assist these two societies to do all that the situation demands. THE REV. P. H. WICKSTEED, D.Litt., will begin a course of University Extension Lectures on Literature—Biblical, Classical, and Mediæval—on Thursday next, at 2.30, at the Institute of Journalists, Tudor Street, E.C. The first lecture is free.

CORRESPONDENCE.

WINIFRED HOUSE.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—Many friends last year appreciating the household difficulties of our Children's Hospital-Home due to increase in cost of food and general maintenance, kindly gave the management some very welcome financial help. The cost, as we all know, has much increased during the present year, and so again I am asked to mention the matter to your readers, many of whom have been and are interested in our work, and to add that the committee will gladly welcome donations to help them over the present hard times. The weekly milk bill alone is now nearly £3, almost a third of the whole cost of food and maintenance. There is no real substitute as in most of our cases there is tubercular mischief. So far I am glad to say that the general health of the children has been good. Donations may be sent to me.—Yours, &c.,

ION PRITCHARD.
Hon. Secretary.

COLONEL BULLOCK AND CHRISTIAN SCIENCE.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—Colonel Bullock, who has replied in your issue of the 14th inst. to a previous letter of mine, will perhaps be interested to know that while in Boston last June I investigated the claim that Mrs. Eddy when about to be married to Dr. Eddy had given her age as 40, instead of 50 (for this accusation had been made by a previous critic), and found that she had had nothing whatever to do with the recording of it. It was a friend, who had made the mistake quite unknown to her.

Mrs. Eddy has never deliberately misrepresented facts. When Colonel Bullock has studied Christian Science a little more carefully, one of the first things he will discover is the mental nature of disease. The human body is the expression of the human mind, and no function or action can take place without the sanction of the human mind. Heart disease is just as much a product of this mind as pulsation. Such thoughts as fear, envy, hatred, jealousy, malice, lust, anger, &c., will produce bad physical conditions. These are the mental conditions that Christian Science destroys, and thereby frees the victims from their physical effects. The destruction of these erroneous mental conditions is brought about by instructing the individual who is harbouring them as to their erroneous, and therefore unreal nature, and showing him the suffering they bring, and replacing them with the divine Mind, "the mind which was in Christ Jesus." In order to understand Christian Science a clear line must be drawn between the eternal and temporal, the immortal and mortal, the infinite and the finite, the spiritual and the material, the real and the unreal.

In the second letter of our critic appearing in your issue of the 21st inst., he seems to express doubt as to whether the understanding of the spiritual fact about anything will have any effect on physical discord. He has only to turn to the Bible, where he will find case after case in which the application of spiritual understanding has healed all manner of disease, raised the dead, multiplied oil and meal, loaves and fishes, and reformed the sinner. Take, for example, the case mentioned in the third chapter of Acts, of the man lame from his mother's womb. Peter and John saw this man lying at the gate of the Temple. Peter took him by the hand, and knowing that he had an understanding of a spiritual fact, which was infinitely more valuable than gold or silver, said, "In the name of Jesus Christ of Nazareth rise up and walk," and immediately his feet and ankle bones received strength.

The record of the earthly life of our Master contains a very striking list of acts of healing and raising the dead, as well as the performance of such acts as walking on the water, &c., which can only be accounted for by the fact that he understood and applied a spiritual law which subordinated so-called physical laws, and destroyed the law of sin and death.

The method by which Jesus healed the sick is very clearly stated by Mrs. Eddy on page 476 of 'Science and Health, with Key to the Scriptures,' as follows: "Jesus beheld in Science the perfect man, who appeared to him where sinning mortal man appears to mortals. In this perfect man the Saviour saw God's own likeness, and this correct view of man healed the sick."—Yours, &c.,

CHARLES W. J. TENNANT.

[Readers will be fully able to judge of the respective positions of our correspondent and Lieut.-Colonel Bullock, and the correspondence must now cease.—ED. INQ.]

MR. DRUMMOND'S HUTS FUND.

AMONG the charitable bequests enumerated in the will of the late Mr. H. E. Bowering, of Borohaye, St. Mary Church, Torquay, and Byfleet, Sandbanks, Poole Harbour, are £250 each to the Moreton-hampstead Unitarian Chapel, and the Swansea Unitarian Chapel.

THROUGH the generosity of Mr. Chubb, Stonehenge has now become the property of the nation, and will be looked after by the Office of Works. It is perhaps better, in these days, that this ancient monument should be under the guardianship of a Government department rather than a private society, like the National Trust, for instance. It is not an easy matter for private societies, however powerful, to control the War Office, or to prevent certain dangers arising from the presence of large bodies of troops in the neighbourhood.

In a letter to The Manchester Guardian, Bishop Welldon says: "The news that British troops are in occupation of Nazareth is suggestive of many thoughts to Christian minds. Every traveller from Europe in Palestine must experience at times in Judæa, and especially in Jerusalem, a feeling of pain at certain local and social features which necessarily grate upon the hallowed associations of his faith. But Nazareth, as I remember it, is or was altogether beautiful, scarcely spoilt at all or changed since the time when its hill was trodden by those blessed feet

Which nineteen hundred years ago were nailed

For our advantage on the bitter cross.

Is it too much to hope that, when the war is over, Nazareth at least will be saved from profaning hands, to remain as an ever-consecrated relic of the scenes amidst which was spent the life of our Lord on earth?"

PROVINCIAL ASSEMBLY OF LONDON AND SOUTH-EASTERN COUNTIES.

THIRTIETH ANNUAL MEETING.

It was the custom, in pre-war days, to hold the Annual Meeting of the Assembly in London and in the country alternately, but in the last few years it has been found impossible to arrange a meeting at any distance from London. This has enabled the Assembly, however, to visit more of the churches in the London district, and we can understand that the Committee were very glad to accept the invitation of the Rev. A. H. Dolphin and his congregation at Lewisham to hold the Annual Assembly at their church. It was the first time that the Assembly in the course of its thirty years' history had met there, and the many delegates and friends who were present at the meeting on Friday, September 27, much appreciated the hospitable welcome they received. It was a thoroughly interesting and successful meeting.

The proceedings began with the Business Meeting, over which the President, Mr. E. R. Fyson of Ilford, presided. The Secretary, the Rev. G. Cooper, read the report of the Committee and that of the Managers of the Auxiliary Fund—which deserves to be more widely known in the Province; and the Treasurer, Mr. E. Worthington, submitted the annual statement of accounts. The Committee in their report announced that they had received and accepted the resignation of the Rev. W. H. Drummond as Minister of the Assembly. He had left for France in December on four months' leave of absence—which was subsequently extended to six—to undertake work of an important religious character in connection with the Y.M.C.A. At the end of that period he had felt that it was impossible for him to return to the work of the Assembly, and to give up the duties he had undertaken in France, and as the Committee felt unable, for many reasons, to grant him indefinite leave of absence, they had been reluctantly compelled to accept his resignation. For nine years Mr. Drummond had been Minister of the Assembly and during that time had rendered most excellent service to the churches on the roll. Evidence of the value which the various ministers and congregations had placed upon his sympathy and friendship had reached the Committee on many occasions, and they expressed most heartily their own and the churches' appreciation of the ability and zeal with which he had discharged the many difficult duties of his office. The Committee reported that they had made grants to the congregations at Ilford, Guildford, Godalming, Newbury, and Billingshurst, and referred briefly to the work being done at these various centres. The changes in the ministerial ranks were duly chronicled, the lay preachers were warmly thanked for their services, the ministers who had settled during the year within the province were heartily welcomed, and sympathetic reference was made to the death of Dr. Drummond, Dr. Hargrove, Mr. Hawksley, the Rev. T. E. M. Edwards, the Rev. G. Critchley, the Rev. W. Wooding, and Mr. S. Field.

The President moved the adoption of the reports, and in a vigorous address touched upon the several matters dealt with therein. He spoke of Mr. Drummond's regretted resignation, and of the beneficial influence of the friends whose deaths were recorded; and he had the satisfaction of claiming that, owing to the willing help of the lay preachers, no service in the province for which the Assembly was responsible had been missed for want of a preacher. He referred to some of the building schemes the Committee had in view, and mentioned that there were many important towns—Colchester and Chelmsford, for example—where our views were at present quite unrepresented. He called upon the members of the Assembly to show a greater zeal and more enthusiasm in making our message known, especially amongst those who are at present outside all the Churches.

Dr. Carpenter seconded the resolution, and after referring to the work of the late Mr. Edwards, and to the long and active ministry of Mr. Summers, spoke of some of the signs of the times which were full of hope and encouragement for the future. Recent addresses by the late Canon Scott Holland and by Dr. Selbie were quoted as showing how the Orthodox Churches were broadening in their outlook on religion, and the warm welcome given to such ministers as Mr. Gow and Mr. Drummond in their work for the Y.M.C.A. showed that the old barriers were breaking down. The passionate individualism of the old Evangelicalism was passing away; the Churches were recognising the value of one another, and were drawing closer together, especially in the field of social service. There was a great opportunity before our churches.

The President then moved the following resolution: "That the Assembly sends its heartiest greetings and best wishes to the Rev. W. H. Drummond, and begs to assure him of its sincere appreciation of his services as Minister of the Assembly during the past nine years, and its deep regret that circumstances have compelled him to resign his appointment." Mr. Fyson paid a warm and fitting tribute to the work of Mr. Drummond; he had stood for all that was best in our ministry, and had left an influence upon the churches that would never be effaced. He sincerely regretted that circumstances had rendered the resignation necessary, and that the Assembly had lost, for the time being, at any rate, his valuable services. The Rev. J. M. Connell seconded the resolution in a happy little speech. Speaking as one of the country ministers, he voiced the gratitude of the churches in the province. Mr. Drummond had rendered them excellent service—especially in the intervals between two ministries. His patience, tact, and wise counsel had been of the utmost value, and his preaching and lecturing had been deeply appreciated. He had gained their confidence and affection in a remarkable manner, and the country ministers had greatly enjoyed his visits to them, and all the friendly sympathy he had given them. The speaker rejoiced that Mr. Drummond had found a larger scope for his gifts of mind and heart, and congratulated their friend on the work he had found to do in France, but at the same time he greatly regretted his withdrawal from the Assembly. He concluded with the suggestion that Mr. Drummond should be appointed as the representative of our churches in France.

The question of a successor to Mr. Drummond had been carefully considered by the Committee, and they brought forward a resolution embodying the proposal they made. This was to the effect that a temporary appointment be made of some minister resident in the province, who should arrange the preachers' plan, keep in touch with the country churches, and visit them as much as possible; and the Committee recommended that the appointment be offered to the Rev. A. H. Dolphin of Lewisham. The Chairman strongly recommended this proposal to the meeting; it was seconded by Mr. Ronald Jones, who pointed out that it was quite time that the churches resumed some of the work they had dropped four years ago. The resolution was carried unanimously, after Mr. Alfred Wilson had pointed out the danger that some of the churches were running, and the loss some of them had already suffered, through the absence of their ministers. On the motion of the Rev. J. H. Weatherall, Mr. Fyson was heartily thanked for his services during the past two years. He had been a most admirable and energetic President. The Rev. James Harwood is to be the new President, all the other office-holders being re-elected.

'CAN A NATION INSURE ITS LIFE?'

At the conclusion of the business, Dr. Jacks gave an address on 'Can a Nation Insure its Life?' It is not possible to give an adequate summary of the address here; it dealt with the scheme of international insurance which Dr. Jacks is anxious to lay before the nation for consideration and discussion. There are many forces that go to make wars, but they all ultimately depend upon one, viz., finance: finance is, as it were, the "linchpin." Get control of this force and you are master of all. The policy, therefore, is to put finance under international control, and so get control of the whole war-making situation. Mutual Insurance had stood the test of time; it had behind it the authority of the experts; it had proved to be of the greatest moral value and its utility could not be measured by figures. Why should not nations, like individuals, learn to insure themselves against dangerous acts? The scheme he proposed, which was still in the tentative stage, suggests that the belligerent nations, with such neutrals as might wish to join, should form an Incorporation of Mutual Insurance for the purpose of insuring their economic stability. The nucleus of the Fund might be formed (1) by the conversion of an agreed proportion of the National Debt of each participating State; (2) by transfer of specified colonial possessions; and (3) by appropriation of any indemnity imposed at the end of the war. Each state would take out a National Policy, terminable or otherwise, insuring the whole or part of the interest on its Debt, and would pay an agreed premium to secure this and certain other benefits. Among these benefits would be a guarantee against war risks, but any state declaring war would be exposed to the cancelling of its policy if the Courts of the Trust found that such declaration be contrary to the international rules under which the Trust would be established. All this was set forth in Dr. Jacks's address with much point and apt illustration. He claimed that this proposal was worth the most careful consideration, and he appealed to the audience to study it for themselves.

There was no time left for discussion, but the Rev. W. G. Tarrant expressed the thanks of the Assembly to Dr. Jacks for his most interesting address. He, for one, would gladly enrol as a student of the scheme, and he earnestly commended it to the careful attention of all thoughtful persons. It was specially fitting, said Mr. Tarrant, that such a subject should be presented in that Assembly by one of its most distinguished members; in this work, he was following the example of the celebrated Dr. Price, minister of their ancient congregation at Hackney. Nearly a century and a half ago, that great man had endured much opposition in the cause of mutual insurance, a cause which, as Dr. Jacks had said, had signally triumphed and had been of immeasurable benefit in all sorts of ways. Dr. Jacks was clearly a worthy spiritual successor both of Dr. Price and of the late Dr. Roger of Harvard, to whose initiative he owed the idea of the scheme he was so ably advocating.

After tea, which was kindly provided by the Lewisham congregation, a religious service was held. The Rev. Joseph Wood was to have been the preacher, but was prevented by illness from fulfilling his engagement; and the death of Dr. Hargrove had robbed the Assembly of its duly appointed "Supporter." Under these circumstances, the Committee invited Dr. Carpenter to preach the Annual Sermon and he kindly consented to do so. The Rev. A. H. Dolphin acted as Supporter. At the beginning of his sermon, Dr. Carpenter paid an affectionate tribute to the memory of Dr. Drummond and Dr.

Hargrove, and referred in sympathetic terms to the illness of Mr. Wood. The sermon itself was based upon the words: "Strengthen the things that remain" and "Behold! I make all things new," and was listened to with deep interest.

So ended a series of excellent meetings, and members dispersed feeling that it was good to have been there.

MONTHLY NOTES.

THE Maternity Home has been very busy since it moved into the country about four miles out of the town of Calais. Last month there were two pairs of twins, and I am delighted to hear that they are all doing well. There have been several serious cases and two deaths. Our move into the country has taken us out of the reach of the military hospitals so we cannot avail ourselves of their sterilisers and instruments as we did in the town. This has entailed a certain outlay in supplying these necessary things.

There has been very sad news from Chambéry hospital. The Spanish influenza has raged through the wards attacking patients and orderlies alike. There were twenty-four deaths, as the most feeble among the patients succumbed quickly. The English ladies who were out there to run the canteen were quite properly excluded from the hospital during the epidemic. They were so disheartened by their inactivity for some weeks and by the difficulties of getting provisions that they have decided to give up and have already left. This is a great disappointment and nothing more can be done in this direction at present. The English nurse remains, and is doing splendid work among the men.

The news from the Belgian front this week fills us with hope that their long exile is drawing to an end. But their fine fighting means many wounded, who will fill the hospitals. I now understand the great demands I have had these last few weeks from the doctors at the front and their cryptic allusions to the special need they would have of instruments, &c., in the near future! The troops have again proved themselves second to none for valour and dash, and only those who have known what this four years of trench warfare has been to them can realise what a splendid relief it is to be "up and doing" again, now that their turn in the great scheme of the war has come.

UNIVERSITY EXTENSION AND THE NEW EDUCATION ACT.

A SMALL town, memorable in history; for was not its siege by Cromwell and Fairfax the turning point in the great Civil War? And was not Monmouth proclaimed King of England on its Cornhill? Here, in this small town of Bridgwater, a conference, not unimportant, was held on September 27. The Town Hall in which it met is a plain building bereft of historical or architectural distinction, but the Council Chamber is not entirely devoid of the state of a Municipality dating from the reign of King John. The room is draped with noble tapestry, and the canopied seat of the mayor is very like a throne. It was occupied a week ago by the Chairman of the Somerset County Council, the Rt. Hon. Henry Hobhouse. The councillors' seats were occupied by members of the County and Borough Educational Authorities, head teachers of schools in the district, and organisers and secretaries of Oxford University Extension centres. These people had gathered from all parts of the county of Somerset to hear an address from Mr. J. A. R. Marriott, the M.P. for Oxford City, and Secretary to the Oxford Delegacy. The address consisted of a lucid explanation of the new Act in its relation to University Extension. The great opportunity awaiting University Extension in the new Act was pointed out. Under the Act, Local Authorities are required to consider the possibility of co-operating with Universities for the instruction of young persons in Continuation Schools. And it is contended that in all the educational schemes which, during the next few months, Local Authorities will be engaged in drafting, University Extension work ought to have a prominent place. That University Extension organisers and the various local Educational Authorities should be brought into touch with one another with a view to sympathetic co-operation is most desirable for the efficient working of the new Act; and the meeting in Bridgwater is probably one of many.

CLEMENT E. PIKE.

OUR BLINDED MEN.

SIR ARTHUR PEARSON, speaking at the Palladium last Tuesday (St. Dunstan's Day) gave an extremely interesting and cheery account of the work which is being done at the famous Hostel in Regent's Park. The point he specially emphasised was that the words "affliction" and "resignation" are unknown there; it was the fighting spirit rather than the note of patience that they encouraged, and normality was what they aimed at producing. A blind man at St. Dunstan's was simply a normal man without sight, and Sir Arthur maintained that the concentrated efforts which the lack of sight involved stimulated the mind so much that many of the inmates of St. Dunstan's were now far better developed mentally than before they were blinded. In addition to this, some of those who had been trained within its walls to earn a living in various useful ways—as telephonists, masseurs, shorthand writers, and the like—were actually making more money than they did in the days when they had their sight. The large audience greatly appreciated Sir Arthur Pearson's speech, to which special point was lent by the fact that he is himself almost totally blind, and that he is devoting his best energies to helping those who, as he put it, have gone through the same experience of starting on the "dark trail" with a feeling of helplessness and bewilderment.

NOTES ON SOME RECENT BOOKS.

Cady (N. Emille). LESSONS IN TRUTH: a course of twelve lessons in Practical Christianity. London, The Power Book Co. 199 pp., 3s.

The books published by the Power Book Co. all preach the affirmative gospel of faith in God and belief in His goodness. They aim at putting old truths in a way that, if not new, seems to be more easily assimilated by some modern minds than the ancient wisdom, and is in accordance with popular theories of mental power and self-determination. This particular volume is not for serious students of theology: but to lowly minded folk who want the new teaching in simplified form it will convey many ideas that are sound, wholesome and optimistic.

Chellow (Henry), M.A., Ph. D., D.Sc. CONCENTRATION AND THE LAWS OF MENTAL EFFICIENCY. London, The Power Book Co. 128 pp., 2s. 9d.

Sundry hints, given in a way which will be new to many, on the laws of mental efficiency.

King (Leonard W.), M.A., Litt.D., F.S.A. LEGENDS OF BABYLON AND EGYPT IN RELATION TO HEBREW TRADITION; with appendices. i.-ix. 155 pp.

The lectures reprinted here (the Schweich Lectures for 1916) emphasise the archaeological side of the subject, and are an attempt to accommodate familiar facts to new and supplementary evidence which has been published in America since the outbreak of the war. Copious references have been inserted, and some valuable appendices complete the volume.

Sully (Dr. James). MY LIFE AND FRIENDS. Fisher Unwin. 344 pp. index, 12s. 6d. n.

A book abounding in reminiscences of celebrities in the academic and literary circles of the latter half of the Victorian age. The sub-title 'A Psychologist's Memories'—must not be taken too much to heart. The volume for the most part discourses of men and scenery in a pleasant chatty way, and though the work of a scholarly pen, is attractively easy reading. Added to the sketches of life experiences beginning in Bridgwater "in the forties," and focussing upon London more and more from student days, "pen-portraits" are given of George Eliot, James Cotter Morrison, H. Sidgwick, Herbert Spencer, Leslie Stephen, Wm. James, and George Meredith.

Wells (H. G.). JOAN AND PETER. London, Cassell & Co. 748 pp., 9s.

This book, like every other book from his pen, is a result of the tremendous vitality, insatiable curiosity and idealism of Mr. Wells. His idealism has never been more clearly manifested, for he is here dealing with education, and is impelled from first to last by a characteristic passion for "clearing up the mess" in which we find ourselves through our mental slothfulness and the disinclination to think things through. The accent jars occasionally, but there are some delightful things in these pages, and at a time like the present it is a fascinating experience to go back "to that glowing pause at the end of the nineteenth century."

MAGAZINES AND REVIEWS.

The Quest, Cornhill.

THE deliverance of the Holy Land from Turkish misrule was made a subject of special thanksgiving in many churches on Sunday. The Bishop of London, at St. Paul's, whose audience included the Lord Mayor and Corporation, took occasion to insist once more on the urgent need of social and moral crusades at home.

THE annual business meeting of the Liberal Christian League will be held at 28 Red Lion Square, W.C., on Saturday, October 26th, at 3.30, the President, the Rev. C. J. Sharp, in the chair. The Liberal Christian, which is issued quarterly by the League, is now entering its fourth year.

THREE interesting lectures have been arranged by the Child-Study Society which will be given at the Royal Sanitary Institute, Buckingham Palace Road, as follows: October 10, 'Training the Children for Citizenship in America,' Mrs. Katharine Boulker; November 7, 'The Girl Guide Movement,' Lady Baden Powell; November 28, 'Sight-Saving Schools,' by N. Bishop Harman, M.A., M.B., F.R.C.S.

EASTERN UNION OF FREE CHRISTIAN CHURCHES.

THE annual meetings of the Eastern Union of Unitarian and other Free Christian Churches took place at Friars Street Chapel, Ipswich, on Thursday, Sept. 26. In the afternoon the business of the Union was transacted under the chairmanship of Mr. Robert Hamblin, president for the year.

The annual report, read by the Rev. J. W. Saunders (secretary), called attention, amongst other matters, to the fact that at Diss an occasion of uniting religious activities with the Anglican Church, and at Framlingham one of holding a united service with the other Nonconformist bodies, had occurred. The church at Diss was now reported free of debt, and a settled arrangement had been made for the conduct of the services. Reports from the Suffolk Village Mission and the Postal Mission were also read and adopted.

Mr. A. M. Stevens, of Norwich, moved, and Mr. Waller, of Norwich, seconded, in complimentary terms, the re-election of Mr. Hamblin as president, for the third year, and treasurer; of the Secretary; and of Miss Dowson as secretary of the Village Mission; and the election of the Rev. J. B. Robinson, of Hapton, to the secretaryship of the Sunday School Union. In supporting the motion, Mr. G. J. Notcutt added his testimony to the value and worth of Mr. Hamblin as president. A representative committee was appointed. After tea in the schoolroom, provided by lady members of the Ipswich congregation, a service was conducted by the Rev. J. W. Saunders. The preacher was the Rev. Miss Margaret B. Crook, B.A., who has recently undertaken the pastorate of the Octagon Church, Norwich. Taking for her text Psalm cxi. 1, Miss Crook invoked a note of joy and triumph for the unprecedented opportunities opening up to the Church at the present time, asking whether it was not the world that had failed rather than the churches, as many said. Through all time the Church—that Church which existed wherever two or three were gathered together in the cause of God and righteousness—had had to struggle against difficulties; but they must rejoice that its spiritual life had not yet been broken. She set forth many special directions in which the present time and the immediate future would call for the Church's services. The great traditions and records stored up from the past could be employed to show that man must have God if he is to do good work in the world. Fitting souls could be called to retirements and solitudes wherein they might catch the voice of God to carry it back with them to the busy world. They could promote the realisation of a human life devoted to human fellowship, with the life of Christ before them to imitate and to follow, and of their individual churches as communities of holy fellowship wherein all were equal in the presence of each other, making the church the most vitally democratic association in the world, and giving thus to all a local habitation and a spiritual home. Having outlined these and kindred aims, the preacher next specified those to whom the Church was called upon in particular to address its ministrations. These included the children, in whom a realisation of the possession of a spiritual life needed to be awakened; our soldiers, after demobilisation, in order to clear away from their souls the deep-sunk stains left by warfare; and those distressed for lost ones—who were in some instances having recourse to wizardry and similar agencies to obtain consoling assurances—in order to point out and guide them to the path of true comfort and solace.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Bootle.—As we indicated last week, the Rev. H. Fisher Short has accepted the unanimous invitation of the Free Church congregation to become its minister, and will commence his new duties next April. In the meantime Mrs. Walter Short will continue to "carry on" as she has done during the past three years, and it is hoped that the congregation will loyally support her so that the church and its institutions may be in a flourishing condition when the late minister's place is taken by his brother. The simple commemorative Harvest Thanksgiving Services which have been customary during the war will be held again this year, when the Rev. C. J. Street, formerly minister of the church, will be the preacher.

Bournemouth.—For economy in light and fuel, and because of the difficulty of attendance on dark winter evenings, it has been decided to give up the Sunday evening service for the present, and to hold instead an afternoon service at 3 o'clock. The character of the proposed services is described in the public announcement as follows: "An hour with organ music, hymns and songs, and quiet Fellowship in things of the Higher Life. Brief addresses on questions of Practical Religion." Friends are asked to make this new departure known to visitors and especially to soldiers who may be in hospital or otherwise in the town. The Sale of Work to be held on October 18, as advertised in another column, is to be opened by Mrs. Cogan Conway of Ringwood, President of the Southern Unitarian Association.

Harvest Festivals.—We have received reports of Harvest Festival services from:—Chowbent (Sept. 22), preacher, the Rev. J. J. Wright (the minister); Ipswich (Sept. 29); Horwich (Sept. 29), preacher: the Rev. F. Coleman of Burnley; Colne (Sept. 29), preacher, the Rev. J. Pipkin; Loughborough (Sept. 29), preacher, the Rev. W. M. Long.

Leicester: Narborough Road.—The induction of the Rev. Hugh V. Salmon, as minister of the Free Christian Church, took place on Monday, September 30, at 5 o'clock. Dr. Rattray, Minister of the Great Meeting, conducted the Devotional Service, and the Rev. James Harwood, representing the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, in giving the charge to Mr. Salmon, dwelt upon the peculiar dangers and anxieties attaching to the ministry and contrasted these with the attractions which the position holds, reminding his hearers that the ministry of the church was the greatest work to which a man could put his hand. The Rev. Alfred Hall (Sheffield), who has been known to members of the Free Christian Church for twenty years, gave the charge to the congregation. There was an excellent attendance at the Service. After tea, a Public Meeting of welcome, at which the chair was taken by Mr. W. F. Price, was held in the schoolroom. Apologies for non-attendance were received from the Rev. W. Whitaker (Manchester), a former minister, and from the Rev. H. H. Jones (Hinckley). The Chairman was anxious that the impression should go forth that the Free Christian Church was a live force, and that even if there had been vicissitudes in a period going back more than fifty years, there was a deep-rooted spirit of earnestness which denoted that the cause was always a healthy one. Dr. Rattray extended a welcome to Mr. Salmon on behalf of the churches of the district, and the Revs. James Harwood, Alfred Hall, Kenneth Bond (a former minister), and W. M. Long (of Christ Church, Nottingham, and Loughborough) also spoke. The Rev. H. V. Salmon responded. There was a large attendance, including a number of members of the Great Meeting.

Liverpool.—Special Services commemorating the Ter-centenary of the Ancient Chapel of Toxteth will be held on Sunday, October 6, Dr. Jacks of Oxford will be the preacher in the morning, and the Rev. C. M. Wright in the evening. A Commemorative Tablet is to be placed over the entrance door (Park Road), containing the following inscription:—

1618—1918.
THE ANCIENT CHAPEL OF TOXTETH.

For three hundred years this has been a meeting place of those who have sought in the free worship of God, strength and patience for the service of man.

Here Richard Mather, called by the people of Toxteth to "instruct them in the things of God" began his ministry Nov. 30th, 1618.

In commemoration of the Ter-centenary and as a grateful tribute to the memory of those who were pioneers of liberty in religious thought and fellowship this tablet was erected by the congregation in 1918.

Several friends sent suggestions for the wording of the inscription, including Dr. J. Edwin Odgers, of Oxford (a former minister), and Dr. J. Estlin Carpenter, whose suggestions have largely been adopted.—The temporary amalgamation of the two congregations (the Ancient Chapel and Ullet Road), is said to be working satisfactorily. It has been suggested that a Teachers' Preparation Class be formed in order to make the teaching throughout the Sunday school more uniform, and means will be taken to arrange for such a class as soon as possible.

Liverpool: Ullet Road.—Dr. Jacks, of Oxford, who will preach at the Ancient Chapel of Toxteth on Sunday morning (October 6), will preach at Ullet Road in the evening.

London: Bermondsey.—On Sunday evening, September 29, a large and sympathetic congregation attended a memorial service to Sergeant-Major Harry Favell, M.M., who was killed in action in France. Sergeant-Major Favell was an old scholar in the Sunday School and a member of the church; he was a favourite with all who knew him. Special reference was also made to Private Joseph Watts, who has been missing for more than two years. He was also a former Sunday scholar and church member, a splendid fellow, and specially loved for his cheerfulness.

London: Islington.—Unity Church re-opens this month after the temporary closing necessitated by the resignation of the minister and the difficulties of maintaining the services during the holiday season. Lieut.-Col. Bullock will be the preacher for the next four Sundays. A meeting was held on Sept. 25 to bid farewell to the Rev. J. Vint Laughland and Mrs. Laughland on their leaving London for Sheffield. Mr. Alfred Wilson presided and in a sympathetic speech expressed the goodwill of the congregation towards Mr. and Mrs. Laughland and earnest wishes for their future welfare, and Mr. J. T. Mackey, as senior member of the congregation, presented them with the sum of £56 10s subscribed by members and friends as a testimonial.—The Flower Show and Handwork Competition which was held recently was a great success, and the specimens of artistic and useful articles exhibited won much praise.—In spite of the holiday season the Red Cross Working Party has accomplished a good deal during the last two months, and large parcels have been sent to the British Red Cross Society and to Mrs. Bernard Allen. Certain ladies are contributing to the Red Cross Fund at present instead of to the Flower Fund.

London: Stoke Newington.—The evening services at Newington Green Church will be resumed on Sunday evening next, October 6, at 6.30 p.m., when Dr. F. H. Hayward and Mr. W. J. Sanders will give a Dialogue from the Book of Job, illustrating some of the problems of suffering. Dr. J. Lionel Tayler will also assist in the service.

Lye, Stourbridge.—It will be of interest to those who subscribed to the "special effort" made in 1915-16 to know that even now the whole of the contract work is not quite finished. The accounts have been audited, and the auditor states that the total amount received is £234 2s., of which £214 2s. 2d. has been expended.

Manchester.—The Autumn Meeting of the Manchester District Associate Branch of the Women's League was held at Mottram on September 28. There was an attendance of about ninety persons, from the following branches: Accrington neighbourhood, Bury (Bank Street), Chesham, Chowbent, Denton, Dukinfield, Failsworth, Gee Cross, Manchester (Oldham Road), Oldham, Pendleton, Stalybridge, Stand, and Stockport. The weather was stormy and attendance at Mottram was a proof of earnestness and zeal. In the afternoon a visit was paid to the parish church, where the vicar was kind enough to act as guide. In the evening Mrs. H. E. Dowson conducted a short service. This was followed by a Meeting over which Miss Johnstone presided. Mrs. Bodell Smith welcomed the visitors very graciously, and Mrs. Douglas Walsley gave an address on 'Soul Culture.' Mrs. Howarth of Accrington, after moving a vote of thanks for the hospitality of the friends at Mottram, spoke of the ways in which the League is helpful. Mrs. Thackray, of Stand, seconded the motion, and the Rev. Bodell Smith, in responding, said as a minister he had always been in cordial sympathy with the League, and he hoped that soon a branch would be formed in Mottram.

Norwich.—The Rev. Margaret B. Crook, B.A., has accepted the unanimous and cordial invitation of the Octagon Chapel congregation to become its permanent minister. This appointment marks an interesting departure in the ministry of this ancient and influential congregation, and we are sure that many friends will congratulate both parties in the new arrangement. Miss Crook undertakes a great responsibility not merely in following in the line of distinguished men who have filled the Octagon pulpit, but in attempting to mould the church's life in accordance with the new and pressing needs of the age. We heartily wish her success.

Pendleton.—On the Sunday mornings in October and November when no special service occurs, the minister of the Unitarian Church, the Rev. G. Randall Jones, will give a series of addresses based on the subjects of the new windows, which are the joint gift of Mr. G. H. Winterbottom and Mr. W. D. Winterbottom, in memory of their father, the late Archibald Winterbottom, who was such a good friend of the church. The windows were dedicated on Sept. 29, the ministers officiating being the Rev. G. Randall Jones, minister of the church, and the church's first minister, the Rev. John McDowell. The latter spoke mainly of his early association with the late Archibald Winterbottom, and of the encouragement and inspiration which he as a young minister derived from the friendship and confidence of a man famous throughout the commercial life of Manchester for his sincerity, uprightness, generosity, and unimpeachable integrity. Mr. Randall Jones said it was his duty to dedicate the windows, but alone he was unable to do that. It was for the congregation to dedicate them by using their beauty and symbolism to help them to live true and beautiful lives. Mr. J. Wigley, J.P., expressed the thanks of the Committee and congregation to the donors for their generous gift, together with their appreciation of the beautiful work of the artist, Mr. Sylvester Sparrow, of London. It is recorded in the Calendar that Second-Lieut. R. J. Webb died of wounds in the German Field Hospital at Lappiow, June 1, 1918.

Southampton.—The Rev. H. M. Livens, formerly of Brighton, has undertaken temporary duty here in the interim following on the resignation of the Rev. Victor A. Moody.

Sydney.—In celebration of his 30 years' ministry, the Rev. George Walters, of the Unitarian Church, Liverpool Street, has been presented with a silver case from his friends and admirers. Miss Freeman, the oldest member of the Sydney Unitarian Church, made the presentation on behalf of the church members. Judge Backhouse made eulogistic references to Mr. Walters' work for the Church, and his interest in literature, and touched on his association with the Dickens and Shakespeare Societies. Others who placed laurel wreaths on the minister's brow were Mr. W. Holman (father of the Premier), Mrs. Peterson, Mrs. Hogg, Mr. William Welch, F.R.G.S., Mrs. Morrell, Mr. W. Westman, Mrs. Harris, and Mrs. Galloway. Altogether 44 years of the Rev. G. Walters' life have been spent in the ministry.

Wandsworth.—The War Savings Association continues its prosperous course; upwards of 2000 certificates have been purchased by members. The Social and Literary Union held the opening meeting of the new session on Thursday. The thirty-third anniversary of the opening of the church will be celebrated to-morrow concurrently with Harvest Thanksgiving, the Rev. W. G. Tarrant officiating.

The Women's League.—On Thursday evening, September 26, a devotional service for women and girls was conducted in University Hall, Gordon Square, by Mrs. Collins Odgers of Liverpool, and Mrs. Oram, of the Wandsworth Branch, acted as organist. Mrs. Odgers gave an address on 'Torchbearers,' in the course of which, describing the Lady Chapel, the only part of the new Cathedral of Liverpool which is yet built, she told how in the vestibule and on the stairs there are medallion portraits of women, gathered from every class, who have laboured in very various ways to make the world better. Each portrait stands as a symbol of all noble women following in their footsteps. Mrs. Odgers urged her hearers to take up the tasks begun in earlier generations, and to tend the Spirit of religion and love which lies at the root of all true service. Those who heard Mrs. Odgers will remember the earnestness with which she delivered her address, and think gratefully in the midst of their many difficulties of her words of courage and cheer. The service was a real consecration for the winter's work that lies before us. About fifty members of the London Branches were present.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

All letters and manuscripts for the Editor should be sent to 13 Bream's Buildings, Fetter Lane, London, E.C.4. They must reach the Editor not later than Wednesday morning for publication the same week.

THE spirit and terms of President Wilson's reply to Prince Max's appeal for an armistice and the opening of negotiations has been cordially approved, and many of us are profoundly grateful that among the men in whose hands the fate of mankind so largely rests there is one of such high ideals combined with so much force of character and clearness of expression. We are all glad that the Germans have to reckon with a man of his stamp, and we cannot doubt that the reckoning will be severe, as justice demands, and at the same time free from self-interest. The crux will come when it is a question of those interests and demands of the respective allied nations which may run counter to his great programme of pacific settlement. As we go to press, Viscount Grey of Falloden, one of the few statesmen on our side who with a far wider experience than Wilson's represents the same high type of mind, is addressing a thronged audience on the subject of a League of Nations, and we may be sure that many in Germany to whom Prince Lichnowsky's emphatic vindication of Grey cannot have been in vain, will be among his audience across the seas. It is an impressive moment in the world's history. Destiny is rapidly striding on. While our military successes multiply so wonderfully we need more than ever to guard ourselves against the losses on the spiritual battlefield.

"LAWRENCE HOUSE" appeals on another page for further financial support. If our readers could see the gratefully happy faces of the men who from time to time spend at the hostel a few hours' respite from war, or could peruse as we have been privileged to do the letters, overflowing with thanks, which pour into the secretary's box they would realise more fully than in any other way what a genuinely good thing it all is. It will certainly not appeal in vain. This is our very own work for our very own lads, for whom the best we can do is all too little to show our affectionate pride in them. We are glad to hear that, supporting this appeal, Mr. and Mrs. Sydney Martineau have promised 20 guineas, and Mr. Ronald P. Jones has made a "sporting" promise of £5 apiece for the occupation of each of the ten following places: Bulgaria, Damascus, Cambrai, St. Quentin (which with the three preceding he reckons as occupied already), Lille, the Belgian Coast, Brussels, Metz, Constantinople, Trieste. May he soon have the pleasure of paying up for all! In the meantime, we hope these examples will be widely and quickly followed.

M. ÉMILE BOUTROUX, whose death at the age of 73 is announced, was not only a keen student and apt critic but also a sympathetic expounder of philosophy in its leading forms, and while eager to catch the suggestions of new thinkers did not, like some progressive minds, lose sight of the abiding worth of the old. He took his place among that brilliant group of French writers in our day, who, in vindicating against a materialist determinism the claims of the living spirit in man and the world, once more attested the vitalising energy of the genius of his race. One of his latest publications was the Herbert Spencer Lecture, delivered at Oxford just a year ago, his subject being 'The Relation between Thought and Action, from the German and from the Classical Point of View.' As we should expect from one whose interest in religion was shown by his presiding at the International Council held by Unitarians and other Liberal Christians at Paris, 1913, he made a warm protest against the soulless doctrines which in leading the German mind so far astray have brought incalculable woes upon mankind. We quote some of his utterances on another page.

ACCORDING to a statement issued through the Press Bureau, Regulation No. 40 D., which imposes a penalty upon any woman having venereal disease who has intercourse with, or solicits, a member of H.M. forces, has resulted in a diminution of disease in some districts. It is also stated that, as the United States authorities have asked for the extension of the Regulation so as to apply to their troops in this country, while the Governments of Canada and New Zealand have made similar regulations as regards the troops in their respective Dominions, the War Cabinet have decided to retain No. 40 D. for the present. They have, however, formed a small committee to consider the present system and to report on possible modifications. Among its members are three women of large experience: Mrs. Found, of the Women's Co-operative Guild; Mrs. H. B. Irving; and Dr. Flora Murray, who has had four years' service in army medical work; also Sir Malcolm Morris and the Bishop of Southwark. We must hope that while seeking physical improvements the Committee will be vigilant on the moral and civic side of the problem.

DR. INGE, the Dean of St. Paul's, delivered one of his challenging discourses at Manchester last Sunday. He said our shortcomings as a people had always been intellectual rather than moral. So far as this war had any direct lessons to teach us, they were warnings against indiscipline, failure to read the signs of the times, against sectional fanaticism, and want of balance in our interests. Our collective faults were mainly due to our failure, to our not even having made an attempt, to see the meaning of life as a whole, and the task before us after the war would be largely an intellectual problem, how to direct and organise our resources and stop wastefulness. It was not public humiliation and long prayers that were needed, but earnest thought. Something more than the old strenuousness would be required after the war. It seemed to him that our only chance lay in the revival of the old Puritan austerity, the consciousness of living ever in our great Taskmaster's sight—the recognition that life was meant to be a struggle and a probation for a higher existence. We must recover the zest for work. Patriotism without the fear and the love of God was not a strong enough motive. The enemy was said to be materialism, but materialism was a theory about the constitution of the world, and what we had to combat was no theory, but the assumption that the desires of the natural man, including his dislike of hard work and discipline, were sound guides to follow.

* * *

A TENDERLY appreciative article on the late Dr. James Drummond opens The Hibbert Journal this quarter. It is written by one of the most distinguished of his students, Dr. G. Dawes Hicks, who tells us that he was an original member of the Editorial Board, and from its founding in 1902 till his death was never once absent from its meetings. "We cannot hope to meet again in this world," says Dr. Hicks, "the counterpart of that mind, so scrupulously careful and exact where care and exactness were needed for sound judgment, and yet so firm and unhesitating when assured of a truth, however opposed that truth might be to the views of those with whom he would fain have been in accord. Still less can we hope to meet again a nature such as his; the union of a trained scientific and scholarly intellect with the simplicity and modesty of the humblest craftsman; an understanding keen, alert, and untiring, but entirely divorced from the remotest tinge of self-assertion and wholly absorbed in the interests to which his life was devoted. Upon his unfailing and delicate kindness we could always count; his perfect courtesy, his tranquil serenity, his unaffected piety, his placid trust in the goodness of the power that ruled the universe made us feel as though in his presence we were breathing an atmosphere rarer and purer than that which encircles the earth."

* * *

THE new Hibbert also contains a deeply thoughtful article on 'Prayer and Experience,' by Dr. S. H. Mellone, which will, we think, be found helpful by many who feel difficulty—and who does not?—in connection with this subject. Dr. Jacks towards the close of a characteristically pungent essay on 'Arms and Men' refers to his scheme of Mutual Insurance as applied to international affairs, and promises us that in the next issue he will deal with it more fully than he has been able to do in his contributions to The Star and three provincial newspapers. Among the other contributions are articles by Dr. Sanday and the Rev. A. Fawkes on the 'Liberal Position and the Hereford Appointment.' We confess that their pleadings suggest something highly uncomfortable in the "Liberal Position," whether represented by the two writers named, or by Prof. Kirsopp Lake whose examination of Dr. Henson's recent statement concerning his acceptance of the Creeds they here discuss.

THE MANCHESTER EXCLUSION

THE exclusion of our congregations from representation on the recently-formed Council of Christian Congregations in Manchester, which is referred to in the Rev. W. Whitaker's letter reproduced from The Manchester Guardian in our News of the Churches is specially noticeable at this time, and equally regrettable. The objects of the Council are, as we understand, entirely practical. As defined in its rules they run: "The realisation of the Kingdom of God by witnessing to, and upholding in all its fulness, the Christian ideal of morals." Undoubtedly its formation is due to a determination to arrest, so far as possible, the social evils which the war has produced or aggravated, and to build up the life and character of the community. In such an effort Unitarians, according to their habit and in their measure, are bound to take the warmest interest, and it would have been most unlike them not to desire to unite with those who are making it. By a majority of 35 to 28, we believe, their desire has been frustrated, and they are excluded on the ground that they could not share in the worship at meetings of the Council.

We are perfectly sure that a large number in those communions whose representatives have thus shut the door on Unitarians have no sympathy with such a policy. Even at the time when the National Free Church Council was formed, over 20 years ago, there were not a few among the evangelical bodies who deeply regretted our exclusion from it, and on our side regret was no less sincere at a decision which prevented an intercourse which must have been fruitful in various ways. But we were told by our zealous friends at the time that to include us would mean the wreck of the whole scheme, and we quite agreed that if by casting us out as Jonah the ship could be saved, it was not ours to protest however natural our wish that things could be otherwise. Our regret was inevitably lessened when in a short time we found that there was to be a dogmatic Catechism prepared and issued by the National Free Church Council. Certainly there could have been no part for us in that kind of work.

But the present instance is a very different one, and we shall be surprised if there is not cordial assent on the part of many of our orthodox brethren to the protest made by The Christian World. The event is more unfortunate now than it could have been at any other time. We have been told, and happily we have seen much evidence in support, that war experiences have broadened men's sympathies, lessened their attachment to points of sectarian difference, and brought them together in common works of charity and brotherly help. In connection with the Y.M.C.A., in particular, this larger mind has been manifested, in some directions if not in all; and we had hopes, and still cherish them, that the same wise temper will prevail even more widely after the war. It will certainly be needed, for if the religious forces of our nation are to be at all adequate to their immense task they are needed every one in their fullest measure.

What, then, is the world to say when, contrary to this fraternal impulse, at once nobler and more practical, it sees the old narrow spirit prevailing? What will the returned soldiers think of the churches generally if they come back, as it will appear, to the same old wranglings, bigotries and aversions? We might make appeal to a far higher tribunal, the highest, and ask ourselves how all this would appear in his sight who rebuked his over-zealous followers for setting their orthodoxy—"he followeth not with us"—above practical good work, and who evidently cared more that the least of his brethren should be succoured than that men should say unto him "Lord, Lord." Such reflections will come home, we know well, to many who are very jealous for the Name they love. Would that they could understand that there is love for that Name among Unitarians also.

We turn to a happier aspect of the field in which there is work enough and a welcome for all true workers. The National Union for Social Service has well proved the groundlessness of the fears which we must infer have prompted the action of the exclusionists. Its members include representatives of many widely different Christian denominations—Roman Catholic, Anglican, Evangelical, Quaker, Unitarian—and they have certainly found it possible to join in worship, as well as in work. There has been, we believe, no wavering of fidelity to the respective convictions held among them on matters of doctrine, while there has been heartiest accord in matters of practice. We would put it to the Manchester majority that here is an encouraging example and one well worthy of imitation.

ATTENTION is directed to Lawrence House's urgent need of a Matron to succeed Miss Beeley who, after rendering invaluable service, is retiring from the post next Thursday. If a lady in London or elsewhere would promptly come forward for this most useful, and not over-strenuous, piece of war-work she would greatly relieve a serious anxiety. An advertisement gives particulars.

THE first of the series of University Extension lectures on 'Ancient Literature,' by Dr. Philip Wicksteed, announced in our columns last week, was given at the Institute of Journalists, Tudor Street, on Thursday afternoon, October 10. It took the form of a general survey. Dr. Wicksteed's subject next Thursday (October 17) will be 'The Great Hebrew Prophets.' The series, which covers a very wide field, includes lectures on the Law and the Psalms, Homer, the Greek lyrical poets, the Greek dramatists (with special courses, lasting four or five weeks each, on Æschylus, Sophocles, and Euripides), Latin Poetry, the Dawn of Romance, and Dante (five lectures). The series will be concluded on May 1, 1919.

ÉMILE BOUTROUX.

THOSE of our readers who attended the Paris "International" in 1913 will remember well the venerable countenance of its President, M. Émile Boutroux, who has just passed away. Born in 1845 he studied in Paris and Heidelberg, at the latter place under Zeller. In 1879 he published a remarkable book on 'The Contingency of Nature's Laws' in which, contrary to the views then prevalent, he affirmed that life's emergence in the world disproved a mechanistic constitution of things. By his criticism of the ruling conception of natural law, says The Times, he "undoubtedly opened the way to such writers as Blondel, Le Roy, Labattonnière, and ultimately Bergson, the whole school who have been known as the philosophers of 'action'; while Boutroux's fundamental theses found confirmation in the researches of Henri Poincaré the mathematician, whose sister he married." His interest in William James and pragmatism, though critical, was so vivid as to lead to a demand for translations of his principal books for English and American readers. He was Honorary Professor of Modern Philosophy at the Sorbonne, Director of the "Fondation Thiers," a member of the Académie Française, and of many other learned bodies.

At the meetings in Paris in 1913 he gave an address on 'The Reasons of the Heart according to Pascal,' and referred again to these 'Reasons' in the eloquent address on 'Religion and Science' which he gave as President. He said that Pascal had taught us that purely logical reason was not all our reason. It was but one form of it, an abstract emptied of all its content, a naked form. Our common reason is not that of the geometrician and logician, which makes an abstraction from realities. It is a concrete and living faculty; and when we say a man is "reasonable" we mean that he knows how to adapt himself to things and things to his needs. Our concrete reason unites, not conceptions and abstractions, but existences taken in their reality and individuality. It is to this living reason we must trust, and do actually trust when we really live.

Recurring again to Pascal in his lecture delivered at Oxford last year, M. Boutroux emphasised the unique quality and prerogative of Feeling, which must be allied with Thought and Will if human life is not to suffer disaster. It is, he held, because Germans have too far departed from the values of Feeling, and too much followed the lead of Thought and Will, that their nation has erred so monstrously against other nations and humanity at large. He said: "The real and normal man lives by Feeling, as well as by Thought and by Will. By means of feeling he gets individuality, and this, far from being less and less appreciated, has become ever more important with the progress of human experience and culture. By means of feeling he takes interest in the beings that differ from himself, in his fellow men, in the objects around him, in every thing he discerns in the universe; and so he indefinitely enlarges and improves his inward life. How can it be maintained that, by driving back and annihilating feeling, one will succeed in carrying human nature to its highest degree of perfection? If ever those men, who are now unsettled by their passion for might that crushes and science that pays, should look into their own hearts and candidly question themselves on the comparative value of what they have won and of what they have given up, would they not find that by pursuing as an ultimate end, what, according to nature, ought to be used as a means only, they have lost that which gives human life its true value, interest, and beauty? What shall it profit a man if he gain the whole world and lose his own soul?"

ANCIENT CHAPEL, LIVERPOOL.

"I WILL remember the years of the right hand of the most High." The words fell across the listening silence of the Ancient Chapel last Sunday morning, healing, liberating, revealing, laying as it were a calm hand on perplexed moods and sore hearts, opening the secret chamber of personality where each dwells alone with the knowledge of that which passes and that which abides. The quaint old pews were filled. Outside, the serene graves were bathed in a transient sunlight which touched tenderly many carven names still borne by those who sat within. The preacher was aware of the buried generations, the recent dead, and the ancient dead gathered together in spirit; that greater company shadowy yet real in which, he said, they were all one. And on this tercentenary, this completion of three hundred years of human aspiration as expressed in that place, he took for his theme 'Remembering.' It was natural that he himself should remember many things, for thirty years ago that very day he had entered on his ministry at Renshaw Street Chapel. He had been haunted by the word as he thought over the occasion; it seemed to be sounding to himself, to the Church, to the churches, to his own co-religionists, to his country—"Lord God of Hosts, be with us yet, lest we forget...."

Memory and hope, the two grand motive powers of human life: hope taking the torch from memory to pass it on; neither possessing real value unless combined with the other; holding the secret of the Bible and of all religions sprung from the Bible; vitally linked in the souls of men. To devote that day to great memories was to do a Biblical act. So often are men bidden to remember the past mercies of God that it seems as if the best thing they could do was to remember, the worst to forget. The tendency in men is to forget great and good things. "I pray you," said the preacher, "keep your memory clear."

To-day we give great praise to forward-looking men. "What the world needs," said President Wilson, "is forward-looking men." True. "No man," Dr. Jacks asserted, "honours the forward look more than I. But sad experience of life teaches me that the forward look needs to be combined with the backward look if it is to guide men aright." Only one of the ten lepers was commended by the Master: the one who looked back. The nine who forgot in their forward-looking and striving symbolise the many of this generation. Yet hope is empty without memory. Remember well to-day, hope well to-morrow.

"Remembering" more than anything else binds men together in loyalty friendship, and love. Nothing unites so tenderly as the sharing of common memories. That shared memory of hearth, of parentage, of ancestry is the unbreakable link of the family, just as is the vivid sense of the common memory of our forefathers, their deeds and sufferings, the essence of that feeling of country, of nationhood, embodied for us in Westminster Abbey. As the New Zealand chief said to the scientific men who asked him to explain the origins of his tribe, "our fathers all came over in the same boat." There is no stronger tie among men than that ages ago their fathers came over in the same boat. America knows that to-day. "And this chapel and what it has stood for so long: its faithful ministers to whom your fathers listened year after year, generation after generation, century after century; its magic memories revealing you to yourselves, reaching to the roots of your being; three hundred years not dead, living in memory at this very hour; all these things are alive in the present and in the hope of the future."

Another boon in remembering: it fills our souls with gratitude, one of the most splendid but not the commonest of the virtues. One returns to thank; nine having received forget. An ungrateful age, an ungrateful character, can never be noble nor even very fruitful. Gratitude is the mother of the virtues and it is more than half of religion. The Bible is more than half sheer thankfulness—"I will remember"; "I will give thanks." "Thank God for the light burning in this little chapel for three hundred years!" said the preacher. "The light of liberty it was, and we are the legatees. What that light has cost to keep burning in the world! If we could see the heroes and martyrs this little spot has contained there would be no lack of gratitude among us." There were two kinds of brilliance, he continued, that of the polished surface, soon wearing off, and that of the inner glow from the life within such as shines in the heart of a jewel. Such had been the brilliance here. It was for the living to feed its fires, and the dead slumbering without were the watchers. It was almost as if the building were a living thing, embracing us, bidding us remember.

"Faces come before me," said Dr. Jacks in conclusion, "names are rushing through my mind as I stand here. Were I to pause they would become visions. How good it is to stand together on the rock from which we were hewn, to look down into the pit whence we were digged! The tale of the martyrs is not yet ended—millions more have been added in these four years. The cause of this Ancient Chapel and the cause of these deaths is the same, and there is no more fitting place than this to remember why your loved one died. And as the clouds round our star of liberty break at last, this still is the place where it is fitting to remember—and to hope."

A CORRESPONDENT points out that the Archbishop of Canterbury is "not a son of Robert but of David." We regret the pen-slip on our front page last week.

DEEP satisfaction will be given by the recent statement that, although the Germans in the course of their retreat have committed acts of great barbarity, no wilful damage has been done to the British military cemeteries. The Germans have, indeed, "shown all respect to the resting places of their fallen enemies," and there are many signs that efforts have been made, where immunity from attack rendered it possible, to maintain the graves in good order.

CORRESPONDENCE.

LAWRENCE HOUSE: OUR SAILORS AND SOLDIERS.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—Nearly two years ago an appeal was made through your columns for a large sum of money to establish the Hostel and Social Centre for young men at No. 1 Essex Street, Strand, now known as Lawrence House. While the war lasts the Hostel is for our sailors and soldiers. The appeal met with an extraordinarily generous response and provided the capital required to produce the income which has maintained the Hostel, and enabled it to achieve its purpose and meet a real need. Besides this, the appeal was for a sum of £500, estimated to last for two years, to have literature sent from Lawrence House to 5,000 sailors and soldiers who were, or had been, members of our churches or schools. This has been done, and we now appeal for a further sum of £400 to enable the Committee to continue its activities during the next twelve months. Perhaps the war may be ended earlier; but our men can hardly have returned home. We ask for £400 because of the increasing expense, and because the number of our men has proved to be greater than was anticipated. The last Lawrence House Bulletin was sent to nearly 7,000 sailors and soldiers, although 700 of those to whom earlier copies were sent had passed from our list of living to our Roll of Honour. We now send also to Canadian, Australian, and New Zealand soldiers, and to some soldiers from the United States of America.

The first communication, sent in December, 1916, was the booklet 'For Freedom and Right,' containing inspiring passages for each day of the month, and some hymns and short prayers. It is sent to every man whose name we receive, being greatly prized by the recipients, and is often mentioned by those who come to Lawrence House. Over 10,000 copies have been distributed; men not of our own faith frequently writing to ask for copies. The second message sent was a special number of THE INQUIRER. Next came the Lawrence House Bulletin, and its three numbers have received a warm welcome in many lands. Men who have no opportunity to visit the Hostel welcome the greetings sent to them. We desire to continue to send the Bulletin to our men with photographs, as they were very much appreciated. We trust your readers will make a generous response to this appeal and provide us with adequate funds for this important work. We shall be glad if ministers, church secretaries, and others will supply us with new names and new addresses, so that we may have our information kept up to date. Donations may be sent to R. M. Montgomery, Esq., 5 Crown Office Row, Temple, London, E.C.4; or to me at Streatham Grove, Norwood, London, S.E.19.—Yours, &c.

M. EDITH MARTINEAU (Mrs. Sydney Martineau), Chairman Lawrence House Committee.

Essex Hall, Essex Street, Strand, London, W.C.

NEXT Wednesday the venerable and still vigorous Dr. Clifford celebrates his Diamond ministerial Jubilee. We cordially tender our congratulations on this attainment. Still may he be strengthened to strengthen others and broaden their sympathies by his own.

A RESOLUTION has been passed by the Committee of the Church Crafts League expressing regret at the decision of the First Commissioner of Works to erect a war shrine in Hyde Park, and stating its opinion that the design approved is out of harmony with its surroundings, ugly in itself, and discordant with the sympathies and traditions of the nation.

THE PROMISED LAND.

A CORRESPONDENT in Palestine has sent to The Times a charming description of a small camp crowning "one of a hundred hillocks in a rolling bit of plain" in Philistia. "The scene," he says, "is such as Norsemen invading Yorkshire named, from its likeness to an old home, Kirby Underdale, 'Church-town of the hundred hills.' This homeliness holds the eye in spite of unnumbered strange features. Cactus-hedges from the new world bound the thickets of olive and almond and mulberry. The near distances are rich with orange-groves, and over the hills is the moist green of flourishing vineyards. It is too late for brilliant flowers. One hears with envy of an April carpet of purple and crimson and air fragrant with fruit blossom. To the east in a violet haze are the mountains of Judæa, showing a delicate and characteristic outline, a subject for Ruskin's most pointed pencil...."

"From such a place as this the journey to Jerusalem is perfect. You escape the prosaic railway, and you escape the long drag our elders told us of, in ramshackle flies behind flogged horses. Through Ramleh, the dusty, with its cathedral tower, and Lod, where the Hebrews brought their farm irons to be smithed and St. Peter raised Aeneas from his palsy; where St. George rules and the road from Sion to the sea meets the great route from Egypt to Damascus or Antioch—from Ptolemies to Seleuciads—from Cleopatras's Court to her old home—you pass by endless interesting companies to Enab, where, as some think, the Ark rested (Kirjath Jearim), and where now parties, halting, report to Staff Officer P.L. of C., and then, with a distant view of Michmash, the Philistine stronghold within Judæan hills, and past many a good little house and vineyard, you get to the climbing mountain road; where are lizards of a larger growth, and new birds move, for here you strike the chats, and a pale vulture, with black wings, seems to mimic the white storks, with jet-black pinions, hovering late for their northward flight. And, the climb ended, a wise pilgrim would consent to be blindfolded to miss the outskirts of Jerusalem. At least, he will glance sparingly at new Jewish industrial quarters, and the Italian hospital, and English Cathedral Quad, to keep his eyes empty for a sweeping view of the whole city from Kaiser Wilhelm's useful tower on Olivet. Thence, or perhaps even better, from the graceful Russian tower, one sees spread out below the dome of the Sepulchre Church, and the Temple Square, and David's Tower; and the Russian cupolas and French façade take their subordinate place."

OUR friend Miss Harriet Johnson of Liverpool has been appointed President of the Lancashire County Union of the National British Women's Temperance Association. There are over 11,000 members of the Union.

IN the course of the autumnal meetings of the Lancashire and Cheshire Band of Hope and Temperance Union at Salford, Major Dr. Chapple, M.P., gave the seventh "Hicks Lecture," established to commemorate the long presidency of the Counties' Union of Canon Hicks, now Bishop of Lincoln. A resolution was passed which in the names of 2,850 societies in Lancashire, Cheshire, North-West Derbyshire, and North Staffordshire, representing 360,000 members, urged the Government to take steps to raise the age at which young people might be served with intoxicants to 18, and requested the Home Secretary to receive the Bishop of Lincoln, Mr. J. S. Higham, M.P., Major Chapple, M.P., and Mr. Tom Wing, M.P., as a deputation upon the matter.

A VISITOR'S IMPRESSION.

JUDGING by the deep interest shown in the papers that were read at the Free Catholic Conference, the Free Catholic Movement is capturing certain people for whom religion is a very serious matter, and who have cause to feel dissatisfied with what their respective denominations have to offer them. It seems probable—though in this one may be mistaken—that very few of those who were attracted to St. George's, Bloomsbury, and the King's Weigh House last week are outside organised religion altogether; and the fact that the movement is an attempt to bring back into other sections of the Christian Church some of the finer elements of Catholic worship, while retaining the intellectual freedom which Liberal Christians, at all events, have jealously and nobly guarded, would seem to point to a certain familiarity with the ordinary forms of religious expression on the part of those who have become interested in it. While you are in doubt about the very existence of God, or the historical personality of Jesus, it must be a matter of indifference what attitude should be adopted towards either; but, having accepted the stupendous reality of a Creator, and the leadership of Christ as Lord and Master, discussions relating to the ordering of public worship and the preaching of the Kingdom of Heaven assume special importance. For the Free Catholic the question is, apparently, no longer "do you believe?" but, "can the believer set forth according to the ancient usages of the Church, but in newness of life and animated by the adventurous spirit, the saving gospel that humanity so sorely needs to-day?"

This being the case, it is futile to criticise the pronouncements of the Free Catholics on the ground that they are joyously agreeing to dogmas about which there is still considerable difference of opinion in other quarters. If some of us are free to deny certain doctrines of the Church others are obviously just as free to accept them, and to testify to the support which they find in them as they tread the difficult pathway of life. It is true that, as Dr. Orchard pointed out in an illuminating address, one man's freedom is often another man's bondage; but the freedom of the Church means freedom for all, and the one hope for Christianity, as he showed, lies in the fusion of all its branches in sympathy and harmony without any suggestion whatever of the coercive principle. The Free Catholics, however earnestly they may advocate certain symbolic rites, certain aspects and manifestations of faith which may not seem acceptable save to those whose temperaments are akin to their own, or who have been trained in orthodoxy, are insistent on the absolute necessity of liberty for the individual in this matter of religion. If it were otherwise there seems no reason why there should not be—as one speaker in the audience prophesied—many fresh adhesions to the Roman Catholic Church as a result of their movement. Their aim is, however (to quote Dr. Orchard again) to "free the Catholics and catholicise the Free Churches," to offer a reconciling medium for the sundered branches of the Christian Church that are held apart, in the long run, by just this denial of liberty to think—to inquire—to re-interpret or reject for oneself which characterises the "infallible" authorities at the fountain head. This attitude in regard to freedom was clearly brought out by the Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas in the course of a paper on 'What we mean by Catholicism' when he dealt with the quality of truth—a thing not static or dead, but rather like “a living seed thrown into the earth to be reaped and sown and reaped again and again,” and when he spoke of the creeds as ancient deposits of inestimable value whereby we found an escape from the temper of our day “in the atmosphere of the ages,” but which, inasmuch as they are only an expression of truth belonging to another period we cannot be confined to if the life which produced them is also moving in us. “Only what is dead will keep in hermetically sealed vessels.”

The writer, not having been present at more than two meetings, in addition to the service on Wednesday night when the preacher was the Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas, cannot pretend to sum up the conclusions arrived at in the course of a series of weighty discussions ranging over three days; but it was impossible to remain unaffected by the utterances of men so passionately in earnest, and so clearly impelled by the dynamic of a great and holy purpose, in spite of certain mental reservations which were inevitable. It seemed to the writer that those who approached the whole question of Catholic freedom from the standpoint of Liberal Christianity (or who, at least, were trained in the school of Liberal Christianity, whatever their views in regard to that movement may be now) brought many valuable qualities to these discussions which long-ingrained habits of logical thinking, painstaking research, and fearless inquiry have undoubtedly helped to produce. To a certain extent the pragmatic test must have its place where the vital things of religion are concerned, and, of course, as was pointed out, the Christian faith, to have any efficacy, must issue in certain lines of conduct and in discipline that is good for character. Dr. Mellor, for instance, in his paper on ‘Catholicism and the Ethical Life,’ following the Rev. T. J. Hardy, whose paper was a very interesting one, laid special emphasis on the application of Christian ethical principles to every department of life, personal, national and international. Christianity, he rightly declared, was a mockery if it had nothing to say to us, no definite guidance to give us, in all the activities of our life. He personally believed that the whole law of God was to be found in the Gospels, and that, contrary to the opinion of many, there was no vagueness or uncertainty about it whatsoever. In a fine passage he demonstrated how the Christ life, first shown in the individual, and then through the world, would save men from the sins of the collective life which have led to the debasing even of the material things given to us for our use and enjoyment, and to the destruction of their sacramental character as a means of renewing and enriching the life we have from God. If Free Catholicism retains that sound ethical note, whatever else it may or may not do, it will justify its existence as other spontaneous movements in Christianity have done, and play its part, also, in the reunion of the churches and the redemption of the world.

SOUTH-EAST WALES UNITARIAN SOCIETY.

THE Quarterly Meetings of the above Society were held in the Swansea Unitarian Church on Monday, September 30. The Home Mission Committee met in the morning to discuss the question of resuscitating the Lay Workers' Union, a step which is rendered very necessary by reason of the fact that by the end of the year there will be eight of the churches in the Society's area without settled ministers. A few of these churches are fortunate in having able laymen and laywomen of their own who conduct the services when necessary; others are not in a like happy position, and unless a band of lay preachers can be organised the churches are in danger of suffering very considerably. A meeting of women was also held in the morning, presided over by Mrs. J. Lewis, President of the Society, the purpose of which was to consider in what way the women could best serve our churches, and how they can apply our religious principles in relation to their new responsibilities involved in the Parliamentary vote. It was resolved to hold another meeting at a near date, when it is hoped a Women's League will be formed somewhat on the lines of the British Women's League.

The Business Meeting was held the afternoon, Mrs. John Lewis being the chair. The financial statement was submitted by the Treasurer, Mr. F. A. Whiting, and was on the whole satisfactory. The reports of the Executive Committee and of the District Minister were also presented and adopted. The report of the Executive Committee contained amongst other things a recommendation that the churches should form classes for social study during the coming winter. Some of the subjects suggested for study were Education for Citizenship, Child Welfare, the Drink Problem, Housing, the Relations of Capital and Labour, and Human Brotherhood and International Relations. Syllabuses with a list of books suitable for class study have been prepared on most of these subjects by persons competent to deal with them, and these it was stated would be available for use by any of the churches requiring them. A profitable discussion followed and it was unanimously decided that the churches should endeavour to carry out the recommendation of the Committee. In the afternoon the Rev. Simon Jones read a suggestive paper on ‘The Need for Social Study.’ The discussion was opened by the Rev. D. G. Rees and the Rev. E. T. Evans. The meeting decided to make a grant towards the expenses of any lecturer who might be asked to give an inaugural address at any church where a Social Study Class may be formed.

The President at this juncture asked the ministers present to retire, and she then stated that owing to the generosity of a prominent Unitarian she had been encouraged to make an appeal for funds whereby each minister in the Society's area could be given a grant of £5. The response had been so generous that a sum of £81 1s. had been collected. This announcement was received with the utmost satisfaction and it was unanimously resolved that the sum be equally divided between the ministers. The meeting also expressed the earnest hope that this splendid example would be followed by societies and associations in other districts, as it was felt that in these days of high prices such help was needed by many. The Rev. Philemon Moore, Carmarthen, expressed on behalf of the ministers their cordial appreciation of this thoughtful act.

The meetings were well attended by delegates and others from the various churches. The proceedings were, however, tinged with sorrow owing to the fact that three of the ministers were present for the last time, the Revs. Simon Jones, J. Carrara Davies, and T. Eric Davies having accepted calls to churches in England. A resolution was passed expressing appreciation of the good work done by each of these ministers and regret at their forthcoming departure, together with good wishes for the future. Regret was also expressed at the coming departure of the recently elected Treasurer, Mr. F. A. Whiting, who has joined the army and will soon be leaving for Salonika. A further resolution referred to the great loss which the cause of Liberal religion had sustained through the lamented death of Dr. James Drummond and Dr. Charles Hargrove.

After tea in the schoolroom, which was provided by the ladies of the Swansea church, a meeting was held to bid farewell to the Rev. and Mrs. Simon Jones who are leaving Swansea, Mr. Jones having accepted a call to the High Pavement Unitarian Church, Nottingham. A Devotional Service was conducted by the Rev. Prof. Philemon Moore, after which the chair was taken by Mr. J. Moy Evans, Chairman of the Swansea Church Committee, who spoke in glowing terms of the excellent way in which Mr. Jones had fulfilled his duties as pastor, preacher and citizen, and also expressed the great regret with which the Committee had received his resignation. Mr. Burr, Mrs. Hutton, Dr. T. Evans and other members of the church also spoke in similar appreciative terms. The Rev. Philemon Moore, Mr. Gomer Ll. Thomas, J.P., and the Rev. W. J. Phillips spoke on behalf of the South-East Wales Unitarian Society into whose work and deliberations Mr. Jones had always entered with earnestness and power. At the close of the speeches Mr. J. Moy Evans made a presentation to Mr. and Mrs. Jones on behalf of the church of a silver tea service, and also to Mr. Jones of treasury notes for the purchase of books.

NORTHUMBERLAND AND DURHAM UNITARIAN CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION.

THE Annual Meetings of the above Association were held on Saturday, October 5, the President, Mr. T. R. Short, in the chair. The report of the Committee showed that notwithstanding many and great difficulties the churches on the roll of the Association, with the one exception of Choppington, had maintained regular services. The visits of the Rev. Dendy

Agate, to some of the churches was referred to and great appreciation of his work shown. The treasurer's statement showed an income from all sources of £279 5s. 7d. and, notwithstanding a debit balance at the beginning of the year of £42 12s. 10d., the year ended with a balance in favour of the Association of £8 8s. 8d. The officers and Committee were elected. In the evening a lecture was delivered by Mr. Geo. G. Armstrong of Manchester on 'The Churches and the Coming Peace.' On the Sunday following Mr. Armstrong preached the annual sermons of the Association, his subjects being 'The Unitarian Outlook' and 'War and Belief in God.'

RED CROSS DAY IN THE CHURCHES

THE Joint War Committee of the British Red Cross Society and the Order of St. John intends to appeal—possibly for the last time—to the churches on Intercession Day, on whatever day it is fixed, for much needed help for their funds. In previous years the Day of Intercession has been either the last Sunday of the Old Year or the first Sunday of the New Year. Clergymen and ministers of all denominations are requested to keep these days clear of other engagements if they wish to help the Red Cross. This is the only appeal made during the year by the Central Committee in London direct to the churches, and on the last occasion the generosity of the latter surpassed all previous records. It is earnestly hoped that the next and possibly final appeal will have the same result.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Berkeley, Cal., U.S.A.—The Rev. H. E. B. Speight, formerly assistant-minister at Essex Church, London, has been called to the American Army Chaplains' Training School at Camp Taylor, Louisville. The course of training lasts six weeks and includes a startling number of activities, such as military and international law, horsemanship, drill, first aid, and the conduct of social and religious meetings. We wonder if, as an assistant-professor at the University of Aberdeen, Mr. Speight ever asked a hardy Scot to undertake a six weeks course of study corresponding to this! His congregation at Berkeley has given him leave of absence; meanwhile, Mrs. Speight is occupying her husband's pulpit.

Harvest Festivals.—Harvest Thanksgiving Services have been held at Hunslet (Sept. 29), preacher, the Rev. J. M. Bass; Wakefield (Sept. 29), preachers, the Rev. A. Leslie Smith; Holbeck (Sept. 29), preachers, the Rev. W. R. Shanks and Lieut.-Col. Bullock; Wareham (Oct. 6), preacher, Mr. W. E. Stephens, Lay-Minister, of Poole; Rotherham (Oct. 6), preacher, the Rev. S. Spencer.

Leeds: Mill Hill.—The Rev. R. Nicol Cross writing from France to his congregation on September 22 says: "This comes from a dug-out at the hour of your morning worship, and my spirit hovers fondly among you. Instead of the pillared chapel I share with three others a rude little cave of the earth about eight feet by six; one opening performs the double duty of door and window, and for the organ music there is the orchestra of the guns, running up the gamut from the howitzers away behind, through the eighteen-pounders, to the rat-tat-tat of the machine guns. At times it is a real pandemonium, heavens echoing and earth shaking and the whole air crashing all around, while at night one sees the horizon winking with flashes of light.... Our rations are brought to us by relays, and thus far we have done well. We got our breakfast bacon yesterday afternoon, and to-day at 12 noon we still await with good hope and cheer the arrival of to-day's supplies. Things one sees are a bit irregular and would hardly please the civilised housewife. But we are in that happy condition where a few hours do not matter vitally in the domestic department.... The philosophy of 'Don't Worry' is supreme and works well. The great thing is to be doing necessary and vital work and to feel that what one is doing is worth doing. That is the secret of happiness everywhere.'—A number of Dr. Hargrove's sermons both printed and in MS., are available, as we stated recently, for distribution among our Ministers, Lay Preachers, and friends. A few will be placed in the Chapel safe, so that a future generation may learn of Mill Hill Chapel pulpit and its history during Dr. Hargrove's ministry. —The death occurred on September 22 of Miss Alice Fishburn, elder daughter of Mr. and Mrs. E. Fishburn. She entered the Sunday school at the age of 5 years, and remained an active and valued member until she went to live at Pudsey. Although of late years ill-health prevented her regular attendance, she retained to the last a deep interest in, and warm affection for, Mill Hill Chapel and schools.

Leicester.—Writing on behalf of the Great Meeting in a letter to "our men in the Forces," Dr. Rattray says: "We all desire to express our gratitude and rejoicing that the situation in the war is so much better and the end of the war by that much the nearer. Believe me, you are genuinely cared for by us at the Great Meeting. We sympathise with you: we try to help in any way we can: you are ever in our thoughts. We look forward to the time when you will be coming home and we are eager to welcome you into our fellowship. You can tell us how we can help, and we will do our best to meet your wishes."—Under the auspices of the Workers' Educational Association Dr. Rattray is giving a course of lectures on 'Modern Authors,' including Bernard Shaw, Butler, Chesterton, Rupert Brooke, &c.—Miss Rosamund Gibbs, whose help as pianist in the junior boys' school is much appreciated, is to be congratulated on her high place in the Honours Oxford Local Examinations.

Liverpool: Hope Street.—During October and November (beginning on October 20) Dr. Mellor will deal, in his Sunday evening discourses, with some of the world's great 'Dreamers of Dreams and Seers of Visions'—Plato, Dante, St. Augustine, Carlyle, William Morris, and, finally, Jesus of Nazareth.—The Social Problem Circle has drawn up an interesting programme for the session, and the principal speakers include Dr. Jacks, Professor E. T. Campagnac, Miss Margaret Ashton, Mr. J. A. Hobson, and Mr. George G. Armstrong.—A new series of organ recitals by well-known organists from London, Oxford, Gloucester, and Edinburgh begins on October 17, and on October 11 Dr. A. W. Pollitt (organist of Hope Street Church) will lecture on 'Education of Judgment and Appreciation in Music,' with illustrations.—The Philosophy class will resume its studies on November 5, the subject being 'The Philosophy of Plato.'

Liverpool: Mill Street Domestic Mission.—In a cheery letter to the congregation of Mill Street Chapel by the Rev. J. C. Ballantyne, who became the minister there two months ago, reference is made to the first meeting of the Workers' Council, when about seventy workers were present, also to the special Memorial Services for Privates C. Clegg, C. Fryer, and G. Herbert, all of whom have lost their lives in the fight for their country's cause. A reproduction of 'The Redemption of Love,' from the Darbyshire window in the Library of Manchester College, Oxford, is included as a picture-supplement in the Calendar, and it is Mr. Ballantyne's intention to portray some of the heroes and saints of history month by month on the last page of the Calendar and to "speak of the outstanding elements of the Christian gospel, as we understand and desire to spread it."

London: Leytonstone.—The first anniversary of the Leytonstone Free Church was celebrated last Sunday in conjunction with Harvest Festival Services. The Rev. Bertram Lister of Hackney preached morning and evening, over forty people being present on both occasions. The fruit, flowers, chocolate, cigarettes, &c., which had been contributed were all taken at the close of the evening service to the wounded soldiers at the Whipp's Cross Hospital, where a Concert Service was held from 8 to 9. On the previous evening the Young People's Guild gave a performance of a musical play, thirty of the members taking part. The room was crowded and the collection which was taken on behalf of the primary department of the Sunday school, conducted by Miss Dorice Peterken, amounted to £1 10s. Mr. H. G. Chancellor, M.P., has promised to preside at the Annual Public Meeting of the church to be held on Saturday, October 19, at 6 P.M. Tea at 4.30.

London: Stepney.—A gathering took place at College Chapel on Thursday last to welcome Mr. Wallace B. Tavener, who has accepted the post of Lay Worker in Charge. The Rev. Harry Maguire of Billinghamurst, in voicing the welcome to Mr. Tavener, referred to the good work done in past years by his father, the Rev. Lucking Tavener, and expressed confidence that his son, who had already proved his earnestness and fidelity to conviction, would follow in his footsteps. The Rev. Walter M. Long, minister at Loughborough, expressed his pleasure at being present, and congratulated the congregation on having obtained the services of Mr. Tavener, the value of which he knew from past experience at Stepney. Miss Tagart as a member of the Committee spoke a few words of appreciation and encouragement after which Mr. Tavener duly responded. The Secretary, Miss Florence Hill, read letters of sympathy and regret for absence from the Revs. Basil Martin, F. Hankinson, Mr. H. G. Chancellor, M.P., and Mr. John Evans, an old and generous supporter of the chapel. The tone of the meeting was bright and hopeful and was enlivened by several glees sung by the members of the choir.

Manchester.—The Rev. W. Whitaker, as president of the Manchester District Association, has written to The Manchester Guardian on the refusal of the recently formed Council of Christian Congregations to admit to membership our congregations at Platt Chapel and Pendleton. The reason alleged was that doctrinal difference rendered Unitarians unable to share in the worship at the Council's meetings. He points out that the rules distinctly forbid the discussion of matters of theological controversy, and says that the objects of the Council—"the realisation of the Kingdom of God by witnessing to, and upholding in all its fulness, the Christian ideal of morals"—were most congenial to Unitarian sympathies. While recognising freely that it is "proper for any constituted body to decide the conditions of its own membership," Mr. Whitaker says: "It is not proper for any body to assume the great and revered name of Christian, invite all churches to join, and then arrogate to itself the power to disqualify bodies of Christian worshippers on account of their inability to subscribe some peculiar dogma which is arbitrarily taken as a dividing line. The incident is especially to be regretted because the Council was not concerned with the difficult question of a creed basis for a church. The meetings for worship that are contemplated are not the weekly confessional gatherings that witness to a particular form of belief, where unanimity of views may be considered necessary, but joint assemblies convened for inspiration in a common civic and public work, where much latitude of interpretation might reasonably be expected. Unitarians, of all people, would not be likely to make difficulties about the free expression or the direction of any man's worship. It is plain that a great opportunity has been lost. Nevertheless I am sure that all Unitarians will hope for the success of the noble purposes which the promoters of the Council undoubtedly have at heart. The Christian World describes the attitude of those who opposed the admission of Unitarians as showing "a strange lack of faith in the power of the truth. If there are people who have not laid hold of some aspect of the truth, the best thing for them is to be brought into sympathetic contact with those who have." It believes the exclusion of our congregations from the Union will not only be a loss to them but to the Union itself.

Portsmouth: High Street.—The bi-centenary of the Unitarian Chapel will be celebrated on Sunday, October 13, when Dr. J. Estlin Carpenter will be the special preacher. On Monday afternoon, October 14, a Meeting of the Executive of the Southern Unitarian Association will be held there. A Public Meeting of Celebration will be held in the evening, at which Dr. Carpenter, the Revs. H. S. Solly, G. W. Thompson, V. D. Davis, and others, will speak. The history of the congregation goes a good deal further back than the opening of the present chapel in October, 1718, to the earlier days of trial and persecution for Nonconformity, and this celebration should be of great public interest. The occasion has been taken to carry out a very necessary and extensive renovation of the old building, and friends can mark their interest and their goodwill towards the congregation and its devoted minister by contributing towards the heavy cost.

Pudsey.—The inaugural meeting of the Sunday Afternoon Fellowship in connection with the Unitarian church took place on Sunday last. An attempt is being made by the Committee of the Adult Class to extend its influence by means of an Open Fellowship in which music and good speaking shall be the chief attractions. It is announced on the back of a full syllabus for six months that the main objects are to provide a meeting place for those interested in the consideration of great truths, social aims, and Christian endeavour, and to promote unity of spirit in all earnest workers for God and humanity with the utmost liberty for diversity of opinion. The meeting was something more than a P.S.A., and it is intended, as shown by the topics announced, to be educational as well as devotional and inspiring. A short opening prayer was offered and a lesson read by the President (the Rev. R. Newell), the Chairman (Councillor R. Ingham) briefly spoke, and a forceful address on 'To-day and To-morrow,' was given by Mr. J. J. Booth, President of the Bradford Cricket League, whose theme was reconstruction in all directions. Mr. Ernest Varley, a member of the Unitarian church choir, contributed a solo. There was a good audience of adults, largely increased by friends not attached to the church, and the meeting gave promise of a successful winter session.

Rochdale.—Mrs. Woolfenden, wife of Benjamin Woolfenden, a member of the Unitarian church, who took a great deal of interest in the Sewing Society and was held in warm esteem, died on September 22 at the age of 79.

Rotherham.—Commencing on Sunday next the Rev. S. Spencer is giving a series of addresses at the Church of our Father on 'Aspects of Modern Religion.' He will deal with the connection between Religion and the Supernatural, Democracy, Rationalism, the Reformer, the Bible, the Church and the State. On Saturday evenings a Young People's Social is held, the attendances being very good. The Literary and Social Union, as well as other institutions connected with the church, are in a flourishing condition.

Scotland.—Glasgow—Mr. Alexander MacLaren, formerly editor of The Scottish Unitarian, who was wounded at Kemmel Ridge, is in the Orpington Hospital. We are glad to say he is well on the road to recovery, and that he was able to be present at the annual meeting of the Provincial Assembly on September 27, when it was evident that the injury to his left arm had not robbed him of his usual vivacity and enthusiasm.—The Rev. V. D. Davis, of Bournemouth, will visit Scotland toward the end of October, and has placed his services at the disposal of the Scottish churches on the following dates: October 20 and 21, Glasgow; October 23, Aberdeen; October 27 and 28, Dundee; November 3, Edinburgh. There are two things which he is anxious to preach in these days: (1) The moral and religious demand of the time on the Churches; the prophetic demand of righteousness as the call of God and the Christian ideal of service—a true brotherhood in which the love of God is supreme. (2) The true aim of the Churches, to demonstrate the power of the essential things of the Christian Gospel to meet all human needs. The chief desire in the mind of Mr. Davis is to help the Churches to realise and face their responsibilities. In the recognition of this spirit a very cordial welcome is extended to him, with the sincere prayer that his visit to Scotland will be a blessing to the Churches and a joy to himself. Though divided by many miles from the nearest Unitarian Church in England, such a visit will help to break down the feeling of isolation, and bring the Scottish Churches into fellowship with the work carried on for religious freedom in Great Britain. Stenhousemuir.—The Rev. E. T. Russell addressed two huge meetings from a showman's van on "Tryst Sunday," when people come from all the surrounding towns and villages to the Tryst ground.

Southampton.—The Rev. Victor Moody, until recently minister at the Church of the Saviour, has undertaken lecturing and tutorial work under the Y.M.C.A. Universities Committee amongst the troops on Salisbury Plain.

Wareham.—The congregation of the little church at Wareham is entering very hopefully upon the winter session, which was inaugurated by a social gathering on October 2. The outside of the church, and also the schoolroom, have been repainted, and there was an attendance of 150 at the Harvest Festival. Special efforts are being made to discover friends among the soldiers in the neighbouring camps, and any information in this connection will be gratefully received by Mr. W. E. Stephens, St. Ladoca, Poole, Dorset.

Wellington, N.Z.—Reference is made in the Free Church Calendar to the fact that Lieut. Harry King, who gained his commission on the field after the battle of Messines, has been awarded the Military Cross.

SILVER WEDDING.

PILLING—MARSH.—On October 10, 1893, at Bank Street Chapel, Bolton, by the Rev. C. C. Coe, James Pilling to Minnie Marsh, Torbay Road, Chorlton-cum-Hardy.

DEATHS.

DOWSON.—On October 9, at Upper Broughton, Notts, Benjamin Dowson, late of Nottingham, aged 82.

HARDING.—Leonard Arthur William, aged 20, killed in action in France on August 31, only son of the late Arthur John Harding and grandson of Mrs. Harding, 18 Antill Road, Bow.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

All letters and manuscripts for the Editor should be sent to 13 Bream's Buildings, Fetter Lane, London, E.C.4. They must reach the Editor not later than Wednesday morning for publication the same week.

THE rapidity with which one momentous event follows another in these days might excuse much more popular excitement than is manifested among us. That there is intense feeling everywhere is certain, and here and there—as in London on Sunday night—there have been slight indications of that disposition to boisterous and uncomely mirth which is described by the appropriately ugly name of “mafficking.” But, on the whole, there are signs rather of national self-respect and self-control, and one can only hope that this nobler temper will prevail in the days of victory. We can use the word now without misgiving; the only question is to what extent our victory will go, and when it will be formally recognised by an enemy that is using every desperate shift to evade the inevitable. Even before these lines see the light the end of their futile strategy may have come.

IN the light of the high destinies borne by the passing hours, Viscount Grey's speech on the League of Nations, to which reference was made last week, proved to be a weighty and timely utterance. The enthusiastic welcome which he received from the great and representative audience at the Central Hall, Westminster, was a fine testimony to the unique position which Lord Grey occupies in this country. Here was a statesman whose ability, sobriety of judgment, and personal character no one could gainsay. There was no appeal to the gallery, no attempt to say smart things, no abuse or vulgarity, and no self-seeking in the speech from beginning to end. Calm, clear, firm in its denunciation of the crimes against humanity perpetrated by Germany, there was no bitterness or malice, no boastful cry for mere vengeance in the hour of victory. The difficulties involved in the conception of a League of Nations were laid bare; but they were shown to be surmountable if wisdom and goodwill were applied to their solution. The speech ended on a solemn note of appeal to the moral and spiritual elements in human nature as the guardians of freedom, justice, and right in any League of Nations that might be formed. The men who had died that civilisation might live would have died in vain if their sacrifice did not give us something wider and bigger and better and higher than the world had ever known before. We rejoice and take courage that the ideals and aspirations of England were voiced so wisely and nobly.

IN Lord Grey's view, as in that of all other alert and practical minds, the League of Nations must have positive work to do in addition to the negative task of preventing war. Such a task, indeed, is evidently only to be accomplished by joint action for the ameliorating of those conditions out of which international unrest arises. Mr. Gilbert Murray, in an address at Manchester yesterday week, added his word on this important point, declaring that the League might “open up the most immense vistas for the improvement of mankind.” He also dealt with the objection, which we think is more to be heard in private talk than in public, that a League of Nations would be “contrary to human nature.” If human nature were really of the kind contemplated by certain German teachers and actually exhibited by many Germans in this war the contention would be all too valid. But, as Mr. Murray points out, the League is merely a natural development of that widening process of grouping and of diffusing law and public right which has been seen in the past history of our race.

IF the glowing reports of the celebration of Dr. Clifford's “Diamond Jubilee” do not fruitfully affect young minds, inducing them to consider more deeply the inexpressible worth to the world of the ministry of religion, we feel sure the central figure of the festival will miss a supreme joy. To look back on sixty years of effort to elevate the lives of one's fellow-creatures, and especially to kindle in the breast of youth the flame of a noble purpose, and to be assured, in spite of all misgivings, that the effort has not been in vain, is a reward which few others can equal. But to look forward and believe that the spirit one has tried to serve will through that service find new and perchance far greater exponents in years to come, this is joy indeed. There are young men in the war, we cannot doubt, who will be eager to fling their whole soul into the ministry when they come back. Others will as surely devote themselves no less enthusiastically to works of social and political reconstruction, and their devotion was never so much needed as now. But the prophet that can bring down fire from heaven is still the desire of nations, and in the ministry of religion at its best lies, we believe, the greatest hope of human advance.

IT is in keeping with the course of our reviewer's reflections recently as to Robert Collyer's pulpit eminence in spite of the lack of college training, to learn that Dr. Washington Gladden, that splendid specimen of the manly preacher, never took a regular divinity course. Unlike Collyer, however, he did not leave critical questions to the experts; but, as in his books on the Bible, found and imparted definite conclusions where the habit of the learned is often to hesitate. Judge of this as we may, there was one danger from which his forth-right temperament protected him. He has himself recorded that in early manhood he prayed that the good Lord would not let him lose his soul as a prophet in trying to be an artist, or even a stylist. A risk he did not seek to escape was that attending the outspoken rebuke of the subservience to wealth which has too often disgraced religious journalism and church life generally.

THE Autumnal Meetings of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association will be held at Gorton, Manchester, Saturday to Monday, October 26-28. The place of meeting is so near a number of our churches that to ensure a large attendance no great distances need be travelled. The subjects selected for conference are apposite and timely for a gathering of Unitarians. 'The Threatened Eclipse of Religion' will be introduced by the Rev. A. Thornhill; 'The Recrudescence of the Belief in Miracle' by the Rev. W. Whitaker; 'What Unitarians have to Offer our Young Men and Women,' by the Revs. A. Hall and J. Cyril Flower; and 'The Unitarian Contribution to the Religious Thought and Life of the World' will be the subject of addresses by Mr. R. D. Holt, M.P., Mr. C. Sydney Jones, and others.

THE death of the Rev. Jenkin Lloyd Jones of Chicago, at the age of 75, has removed from the ranks of the pioneers and prophets of the free religious movements in America one of its most eager spirits—perhaps, we may also add, one of its most picturesque representatives. Preacher, lecturer, organiser, editor (of Unity), Jenkin Lloyd Jones filled a place which he had made his own in the annals of Unitarianism in America. He took pride in being a free-lance; and he rejoiced in his liberty so eagerly that he could not long endure to be harnessed to any organisation in which he was not himself the directing and controlling spirit. He loved to work in his own way; but that way had always in view the betterment of the world, the progress of truth and freedom, the harmony of joining sects, and, above all, international peace. Those of us who have sat and talked with him in the church parlour at Chicago will recall his charm and courtesy, his quiet humour, his scorn of all things base and foul. In pulpit or platform his rugged presence immediately arrested attention. His well-shaped head, covered, when we saw him last, with a plentiful crop of rich grey hair, his mobile features, beautifully transfigured when pleading for righteousness, peace, and love, will linger in our memory. Jenkin Lloyd Jones will be mourned by a wide circle of friends and admirers in America, and by not a few in our own land, who were attracted and impressed by his strong and noble personality.

THOU ALSO P

(Isaiah xiv.)

THOU that didst shake thy fist of mail,
Girding thy shining armour on,
Can it be thou, thus breathless pale,
Facing the doom of Babylon?

Thy German gods—perchance they sleep!
Cry to them, ere a mightier Lord
Hurl thee and thine into the deep
Shattered, who durst defy His sword.

O Murderer of millions, brute
Usurping human brain and power,
False to the very heart and root,
Now wither, blasted like a flower.

Hell from beneath is moved for thee;
"Come down, come down," the lost, thy peers

Shriek hideous welcome; "Down, and see Thy place accursed through all the years."

There, Boaster, lie in stupid rage
Till thou canst know what thou hast done,

While earth sings on from age to age
Thy Fall, thou worse than Babylon.

RACHEL.

THE CRY FOR JUSTICE.

MR. LANSING in America and Mr. Lloyd George in our own country have deprecated the thought of vengeance in our dealings with Germany, an inescapable voice within us rebukes the old Adam when he struggles against such counsels. In so far as the cry for justice which has risen with such overwhelming volume in reply to the German démarche is tainted with a crude desire for mere revenge on our enemies it must, with whatever difficulty, be repressed. But we believe there are a great many persons who, while endeavouring most sincerely to cleanse their hearts of any such desire, are none the less resolute against yielding for one moment to weakness and unwisdom masquerading under the form of kindly or even Christian feelings. Mr. Lansing's words on this point are apt: "Let us not forget that while stern justice without mercy is un-Christian, mercy which destroys justice is equally un-Christian."

We are now face to face with a problem comparable to that which confronted us at the outset. Haters of war, lovers of peace and her gentle ways, we were challenged with the question whether war was the worst thing and peace the best thing we could have. We decided, by far the majority of us, that to allow the strong to defy the rights of the weak was to become partners in their guilt. Peace, wealth, life itself, could not be allowed to stand in the way of our duty to protest with all our strength, with our whole being, against this iniquity. To-day we desire the cessation of war at the soonest possible moment consistent with duty. It is no malignant joy in slaughter that bids us hold off from the enemy's advances. Prince Bismarck had a saying that this or that was not worth the bones of a single Pomeranian Grenadier. We are quite sure that no light thing, nothing but the weightiest, is worth the life of one of our lads at the front. The thing that is worth their lives and ours is justice; the foundation of right in the earth; not only reparation, so far as it be possible, for the past, but security for the future of our children and our grandchildren.

This security cannot be attained by dallying with deceitful tyranny and ruthless brutality. A Czecho-Slovak leader, we hear, told the Austrian Government some home truths lately in their parliament. "Your peace offensives are useless. Nobody will negotiate with you." The Central Powers have murdered confidence, and when they give their pledge it must be in some form much more substantial than words. And, as if to guard our love of peace from degenerating into a betrayer of all that is most worth living for, the enemy's outrages on sea and land multiply even now in a manner that suggests to some the deliberate intention of the militarists to counteract the pacific overtures of the nominal Government of Germany. Whatever their motive—which we rather conceive to be that strange inhuman temper which, in dealing with helpless civilians, the sick and wounded, and prisoners of war, has refrained from nothing that might possibly terrorise—the result is obviously to render the Allies more resolute than ever to pursue their growing advantage to the utmost. Quos Deus vult perdere—the madness of the German badness is certainly not going to win us to gentle terms.

In this fateful hour, then, when our own souls, as well as the fortunes of dynasties and empires, are in the balance, we shall do well to hold ourselves well under control, to use our reason and take long views. Some of the voices around us are in the highest degree unwelcome, and if we follow the leading of our fire-eating Reventlows we shall pay for it in costly ways. A strong, clear policy is needed. This iniquity that we have seen in the earth must be put down by signal severity wherever justice can lay its hand on the actual criminals. The system that gave scope to their nefarious designs must, for the sake of mankind and the possibility of an enduring civilisation, be crushed once for all. We are not acting here in our own interests alone, we are trustees of the future; and if we are to be faithful to our trust we must persevere unflinchingly to the end. Let the terms upon which we insist be as stern as they may, they will not be adequate as punishment,—no terms could be—they will certainly not be such as Germany herself would impose. We can but endeavour to make them sufficient as safe-guards of liberty and law in the world, and, for the rest, to have respect to our own good name.

WHY WE CANNOT ACCEPT MIRACLES.

SOME thinking is needed about the miraculous at the present time, when, just because the nineteenth century rationalism is discredited, it is temptingly easy to say that all things are credible and all traditions respectable. It has been well remarked of Mr. Chesterton that since he finds modern research confirming popular legends, he is willing to swallow whole minotaurs. It is unfortunate at this juncture that the argument for non-miraculous Christianity is found handicapped with the phrases of the naturalistic philosophy which has proved wanting. Thus we find one writer taking the position that Revelation must not be made dependent upon miracles, because "all our historical reasoning presupposes the reign of law."

There are two assumptions here, both of which appear to be groundless: (1) That it is our acceptance of the "reign of law" that makes us unable to believe in miracle. This means that the reign of law implies a rigid world order of mechanical cause and effect. But scientific teachers (see, for example, the interesting 'Introduction to Science,' by Professor J. A. Thomson) are now much less inclined than formerly to speak of such a world. The laws they refer to are laws that are true upon the whole, general truths supplying a useful conceptual shorthand of the facts, statements which sum up the tendencies of a growing universe rather than decrees which stereotype fixed lines of action. It is of no use to say to modern men, as Arnold did, that "miracles do not happen," if by miracles are meant incalculable and startling phenomena which run counter to our uniform experience. Unlikelihood is of course an important point for the historical investigation of evidence. But for the religious man unlikeliness by itself is no argument—for God can do and does do all sorts of unlikely things. We have to alter our idea of the reign of law to admit of the rise of new increments of being. (2) The second assumption is that the ancient belief in miracles implied a view of the world in which chaos and irregularity reigned universally, and the idea of cause and effect was little attended to. Now this is an extraordinary assumption, for human existence would be impossible in such a state of things. Men have always connected cause and effect. Indeed the idea of the miraculous could not arise at all, except in contrast to a supposed settled order of things, which formed a background from which miracles stood out as conspicuous irregularities—a background of non-miraculous and normal order in which dead men did not revive and lepers were not instantaneously cured.

Such considerations as these make it obvious that the true reason for rejecting miracle is not any modern discovery of "law and order," or of "cause and effect," but a change in our idea of God. And the proper line of objection to the miraculous is not to assert an order of nature (which the ancients understood quite well), but to show that the attribution of miraculous action to God is a self-contradictory notion and a confusion. The question is not whether God could work miracles. The question is whether any consistent meaning is contained in the assertion that He could. The only way in which such a consistent or intelligible meaning could be put into the phrase would be to suppose the existence of a machine-like world of nature which worked automatically or "ran itself," and upon which from time to time there supervened the direct action of God, which, coming as it were from without, would be properly called "supernatural." The first part of this supposition, strangely enough, as Dr. Rudolf Otto has pointed out, is held in common by rationalistic Naturalism and the believers in miracle. But it is exactly this supposition which is being relinquished by the scientific thought of our time, for as Dr. Otto says: "Nature is not so thoroughly rationalised and calculable as such a point of view would have us believe." And this change in the point of view of science strikingly coincides with the changed point of view in theology. The God we love and know is the God who is necessary to our thought as the explanation of the world we live in. He is the inner meaning of the whole system or scale of values embodied in the sum of things. Now all events that take place are thought of as standing in some relation to this sum of things. If a marvel takes place, which is unprecedented and apparently impossible to be regarded as continuous with the rest of the universe, the mind of man is prone to isolate it and say "this is the finger of God and not part of his ordinary operation." The error arises not from attributing it to God: for everything in the last resort gets its power and its being from Him. The error arises from thinking of God as standing off in isolation from that world which is really the mode of His manifestation to us, without which we should not know Him at all. We have no right whatever to think of Him as a lonely Being, who out of His solitude sends into this world of existence fragments of action that belong to Him only in that solitary mode of being. Such a solitary mode of being is a figment of the imagination quite without premisses to go upon. It is an instance of the bad metaphysics which religion constantly indulges in—as mediævalism speculated about substance and accidents, until, having tried to understand how accidents inhered in a substance, it went on to imagine what substance would be in itself divorced from its accidents. That is the kind of confusion which comes when, having conceived of God as manifested and revealed, we go on to speculate as to what He must be and can do in so far as He is not manifested or revealed. And this is the confusion out of which the idea of miracle arises. It is an attempt to hold in the mind two suppositions which are contradictory to one another: (1) that all life and being is the manifestation of the power of God; (2) that a certain portion of life and being is not the manifestation of the power of God, but must be relegated to mere "nature," in contradistinction from certain other portions which really are manifestations of His power and which are therefore called "supernatural." In other words, a miracle both (1) belongs to the universe, or the sum of things, and takes its place in the world of nature (for it is perceived by natural eyes, by means of natural waves of light, and is in certain definite relations to heat, gravitation, sensation, growth and other natural facts and forces—as when, for example, the waters of the Red Sea divide, or when the fig tree is withered); and (2) does not belong to the universe and stands out of all relation to it, disconnected and defying all explication not only by the light of present knowledge, but of any knowledge that can ever be won in the future. It arrives in this world from another which is absolutely meaningless to the present.

And this confusion has a most harmful effect upon the character of men's religious beliefs, for it interprets God's transcendence to mean solitariness, remoteness and discontinuity with our actual experience. Now this is a vital matter for religion. We cut the very nerve of religion when we reject God's transcendence, and no doubt many people think that miracle must be retained in order to save the faith in transcendence. But the fact is that we take all meaning out of it when we sever it from our experience. When the apostle says that ear hath not heard nor eye seen the transcendent realities of God he points to realities that are only further reaches of what we have already known. "I have yet many things to say unto you but ye cannot bear them now." Miracle is the negation of all this. It is true that transcendence properly means that God is other than the world in which He is immanent. But this otherness does not mean that He cannot be revealed in and through that world. It does not mean that He must find some extra-mundane, extra-human manifestation discontinuous with our world in which to reveal Himself. The idea of miracle is based upon a false conception of transcendence, which it seeks to correct by a false idea of revelation.

W. WHITAKER.

THE sympathy of a host of friends will go out to Dr. P. H. Wicksteed, who is obliged through illness, to cancel all engagements this side of Christmas. His opening lecture of the course on 'Ancient Literature,' at the Institute of Journalists, had to be entrusted at the last moment to the Rev. J. H. Weatherall, M.A., who, we understand, will deliver the further lectures planned on the Old Testament; arrangements as to the rest of the programme will be made later. We all unite in earnest wishes for Dr. Wicksteed's speedy return to health.

IN connection with Temperance Sunday, which has been fixed for November 10, the Hon. Secretary of the National Unitarian Temperance Association, Essex Hall, Essex Street, Strand, London, W.C., will be pleased to forward a supply of pamphlets, &c., free of charge to anyone requiring copies to distribute.

CORRESPONDENCE.

UNITARIANS AND THE Y.M.C.A.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—On my desk lie two communications from the War Workers Department of the Y.M.C.A.; one a circular letter asking me to recommend workers—"broad-minded in their religious sympathies"—for posts connected with work among boys; and the other, a letter addressed to one of my friends, a discharged Army officer, the kind of man whose services the Y.M.C.A. professes great desire to enlist. He offered himself for work, and received from the secretary the reply: "I am sorry that the Boys' Department Committee find that in view of your Unitarian principles it is not possible to appoint you as a Boys' Work Secretary."

THE AUTUMNAL MEETINGS.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—Will you kindly allow me to state for the convenience of visitors from a distance who intend to be present at the Autumnal Meetings of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association next weekend at Gorton that the most convenient means of approach from Manchester is by tram-car. The cars from High Street, City, to Denton, and from Exchange Station to Reddish pass Brookfield Church. Visitors from the south may find Hyde-road (G.C.) station a convenient stopping point. It is only two minutes walk from the church. Coupons are not necessary, but those who desire sugar for the various meals served in the school should bring their own.—Yours, &c.,

ALBERT THORNHILL.

EIGHT public lectures by American speakers on 'Life and Thought in the United States of America' were announced to begin on Friday afternoon at Bedford College for Women. The lecturers are Prof. Santayana, Mr. Price Bell, Prof. Cunliffe, Dr. Maclean, Mrs. Boulker, Major Johnston, Prof. Erskine, and Vice-Admiral Sims. Among those arranged to take the chair on these occasions are Prof. Gilbert Murray, Lady Frances Balfour, Lord Haldane, Mr. H. A. L. Fisher, and Admiral Lord Jellicoe.

IN connection with the "Free Church League" (formerly the "Free Church League for Woman Suffrage") Miss Lucy Re-Bartlett will speak on 'The Woman of To-morrow in Religion' at a Conference at the Memorial Hall on Tuesday, October 22, at 3 P.M. Mrs. Re-Bartlett, an Italian subject through her marriage and well known as an earnest student of social, political, educational, and religious problems, has come to England to lecture on women's work and to make her contribution to the growth of a real alliance between Italy and this country. Information as to the aims and activities of the "Free Church League" may be had from the offices, 30 Holborn Hall, Gray's Inn Road, W.C.1.

MR. TAFT ON THE RELIGIOUS OUTLOOK.

As is well known, ex-President Taft signalled his term of office by zeal in the cause of international peace. Therefore, it may be said without paradox, he is intensely in earnest in war on German militarism. He has travelled about the States delivering addresses on behalf of the war, and last month, for example, spoke to an audience of 10,000 people on Boston Common, rousing the greatest enthusiasm. A representative of The Christian Register interviewed him on this occasion, especially as to his impressions on the religious outlook as it appeared to him on his tours. Mr. Taft, our readers will no doubt remember, is President of the Unitarian Conference in America, and takes the warmest interest in the propagation of the liberal faith. In response to questions put by the interviewer he said he believed that among the churches "there had been for some time a gradual approach toward the common ground of religion. Sermons have been tending to a less and less dogmatic character, preachers have more and more emphasised the value of conduct, service, and altruistic life. Almost unconsciously, slowly but surely, churches have ceased to dwell on what separates, and have stressed the common ground of serviceable activity." The entry of their nation into the war had emphasised practical needs, and good feeling and co-operation was seen among the different religious organisations and the churches. No doubt some of the old faults will reappear when the stress is over, but on the whole much of the present catholicity and friendliness will abide. "Deeds are non-denominational." He does not think that Unitarianism will materially benefit as regards numbers from all this; it "will have to be content with comparatively few open standard-bearers. Liberal thinkers will without doubt increase, but other churches are so kindly to them that they will stay in these folds without experiencing any discomfort.... We shall have to go on with comparatively few followers, but the results of our work will be great. Our ideals progress far beyond a commensurate increase of professed adherents." A point which specially strikes Mr. Taft is the wastage of power in keeping up separate churches where the creeds are similar; and where one united effort could "accomplish almost anything."

As to his attitude regarding Germany's "peace" offers it is sufficiently indicated by the remark, "If we meet her and leave her present ideas alive, all we have done is vain, and all will have to be done over again."

MEMORIAL NOTICES.

LIEUT.-COL. C. S. WORTHINGTON.

WE much regret to record the death, on October 14, of Lieut.-Col. Claude S. Worthington, D.S.O., from wounds received in action near Cambrai, October 3. The Manchester Guardian says he had held a commission in the 6th Manchester Regiment (Territorial) for about twenty years, and when war broke out went to Egypt as major. He served through the Gallipoli campaign, was wounded, and went to Malta with enteric, and returned when convalescent direct to the peninsula, where he was in command of the battalion until the evacuation, after which he saw further fighting in Egypt. In March, 1917, the battalion went to France. He was wounded in October, 1917. In addition to commanding the 1/6th Manchesters he commanded the 1/8th Battalion Duke of Wellington's West Riding Regiment and the 1/5th Battalion Dorset Regiment, of which he was in command when he was wounded for the third time. Lieut.-Col. Worthington was the second surviving son of the late Thomas Worthington, of Broomfield, Alderley Edge, and was educated at Sedbergh and Manchester University. He was in business with the Calico Printers' Association, but on the outbreak of war found his true vocation as a soldier.

MR. BENJAMIN DOWSON.

It is with deep regret that we record the death of Mr. Benjamin Dowson of Nottingham, which took place on the 9th inst. at the age of 82. Mr. Dowson has been such a prominent figure among the Unitarians of Nottingham and the North Midlands that it is difficult to imagine the district without him. He was born at Geldeston in Norfolk in 1836, and came of families of staunch Unitarians on both sides. Through his mother (a sister of the late Mr. Richard Enfield), he was descended from Dr. William Enfield of "Speaker" fame, whose family has been represented among the High Pavement congregation for at least a century and a half.

Mr. Dowson lived up to his ancestry, and was for a number of years a teacher in the Sunday school, and at various times a Warden of the Chapel. He was a warm friend of all its institutions, and the congregation owes much to his wise guidance and active work. For several years he was treasurer of the North Midland Presbyterian and Unitarian Association, and on more than one occasion its president, and at the time of his death he was a vice-president both of that body and of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. He was warmly interested in many charitable and educational efforts in Nottingham and at one time sat on the City Council and the Nottingham School Board. He held a high position in the legal profession (in which he had a large practice) in all ways maintaining a lofty standard of professional rectitude, and in 1893 served the office of president of the Nottingham Incorporated Law Society.

Mr. Dowson never sought publicity or recognition, but there were few in Nottingham who were held in greater respect. His advice was always absolutely disinterested, and his actions free from anything in the nature of self-seeking. Of a somewhat reserved manner, it was perhaps only those who knew him well, or those, not knowing him well, who ventured to seek and as surely obtained his aid, that understood the real worth of the man, how warm-hearted he was, and what a wealth of sympathy and kindness he possessed. He will be deeply mourned and long remembered.

After the cremation on October 12, a memorial service, which was largely attended, was held at Upper Broughton, where he resided, and on the following day at morning service at the High Pavement Chapel special reference was made to his character and work by the Rev. Simon Jones.

MR. LAWRENCE WOODHEAD.

WE deeply regret to announce the death at sea, through enemy action, October 4, of Mr. Lawrence Woodhead, member of the South African Legislative Assembly, and a generous personal supporter of our church at Cape Town. When in 1911 the present writer visited the Cape his beautiful home and genial hospitality were opened to the stranger with much more than mere courtesy, and his keen interest in the diffusion of our faith was manifested in every possible way. His loss recalls that of Mr. and Mrs. Macky of New Zealand, who were among the victims on the Lusitania, and the congregation at Cape Town will feel it as our Auckland congregation did that of those dear friends.

The Times says Mr. Woodhead "was a partner in the firm of Woodhead, Plant & Co., of Cape Town, and had always been prominent in the public life of his city. Before Union he was a member of the Legislative Assembly of the Cape, and at the first election after Union, in 1910, he became the representative of the Cape Town Harbour Division in the Cape Provincial Council. Later he was elected to represent the same division in the Lower House of the South African Legislature. Mr. Woodhead was a man of sound capacity, unselfishly devoted to public work, and possessed of much personal charm. He came to England on a visit last spring in the Kenilworth Castle, which was crippled by accident in the Channel just before arrival. During that experience he suffered a painful injury which laid him up for some time, but he had quite recovered and was on his way back to South Africa when he lost his life."

London friends will desire to express their sympathy with the Rev. R. Balmforth and his people at Cape Town, and especially with Mrs. Woodhead and her children. W.G.T.

MISS A. E. SHAEN.

MISS AGNES ELIZABETH SHAEN died at her residence, Crix Cottage, Binfield, on September 23 after a long and painful illness borne with great cheerfulness and courage. Her father, Mr. William Shaen, of 15, Upper Phillimore Gardens, Kensington, was a staunch Unitarian, and his children were brought up in that faith, attending Little Portland Street Chapel with their parents. Mr. Shaen, an intimate friend of Mazzini, and a great worker for the emancipation of women, bestowed upon his daughter an indomitable belief in the perfectibility of the human race and the privilege of personal sacrifice. She desired with passion to help others to wider, purer, simpler, and more beautiful lives. She founded a sort of democratic colony on her small fruit farm where distinctions of class were set aside as far as possible, and all honour was accorded to the actual labourer. With her elder sister she owned Freshwater Place, Marylebone, and part of her work was making a country home for such of her tenants' children as needed change. For years she had in her house various parties of children, sometimes as many as seven or eight at a time, but yet the house was always a home, never an institution. The children lived with the family and were received and treated as equal members of the household. Individual children sometimes remained with her for years if their condition seemed to demand it. She built five or six model cottages on her estate for her gardeners, each house having a large plot of ground of its own. She also built a shop for the sale of fruit and garden produce, with a hall over it for the use of the village.

No activity of Miss Shaen's was self-centred. To her intimates she was an absolutely sincere and loyal friend. She was without envy or jealousy, magnanimous and chivalrous to a fault, since she had to deal with actual conditions of every-day intercourse. She did a good deal of lecturing and essay writing in a small way, and her disinterested optimism and literary cultivation made all she wrote charming. Late in life she joined the Society of Friends, becoming a professed Quaker. She was drawn to them by her hatred of violence and oppression and her belief that love alone can conquer sin. She has left to her relations and friends a legacy of remembrance which will always be precious to them, as "the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen."

M. BOUTROUX.

WE are very glad to hear that the announcement of the death of M. Émile Boutroux which was made in the newspapers last week, and to which we drew attention, was a mistake. The eminent philosopher has himself written to Prof. Wildon Carr (The Times informs us) as follows:—

Fondation Thiers, 5, Rond-Point Bugeaud,
Paris, le 13 Oct., 1918.

CHER MONSIEUR,—Nous sommes bien touchés de votre aimable lettre, et heureux d'avoir l'explication de la fausse nouvelle qui nous vaut d'ailleurs de charmantes marques de sympathie de la part de nos bons amis de Grande-Bretagne. Nous vous remercions vivement de votre fidèle amitié et vous adressons, avec nos plus enthousiastes bravos pour la magnifique et triomphante vaillance britannique, nos plus affectueux souvenirs et souhaits.—
Votre dévoué, EM. BOUTROUX.

We trust that our distinguished friend may very soon rejoice in the complete delivery of his beloved country from the invader, and that he and we may celebrate together a truly worthy victory.

The Rev. C. E. Pike writes:—

It seems long, yet it was but in the summer of 1913, and the scene is impressed upon my memory by a crude hasty sketch, vivid not flattering, but recalling the slender figure with its stoop, the white head, the furrowed brow, the mobile lips of Émile Boutroux, as he delivered his presidential address to the International Congress of Religious Progress. Shall we not hope to hear him yet again, with his fine instinct for spiritual things? We remember with gratitude how he has pointed us to 'The Beyond that is Within.' He quoted Goethe, "Mighty son of earth, take courage; the outer beyond has dissolved, but build a yet more glorious beyond, build it in thine own bosom!" And Augustine's aspiration: "We can mount still higher if we carry our thoughts toward the inner side of our being"; and the great saying of Jesus: "The Kingdom of God is within you"; and Maeterlinck's motto borrowed from the ancient mantelpiece in Bruges: "Yet more is to be found [in me];" and "Pascal's dominating idea that man goes beyond man infinitely." "To sum up, the Inner Beyond of which we are conscious proves its reality by appearing in the light of philosophic reflection, as the condition of the essential elements of human life, viz., action, volition, and perception as therein revealed to us."

EXPLORATION IN THE EAST.

PROF. FLINDERS PETRIE has been reminding us of the heavy responsibility for historical study which we have incurred by victories in Palestine and the future possibilities there and in Mesopotamia. "We may have in our hands," he said to a representative of The Observer a fortnight ago "the development of the sites of the greatest ancient civilisations, the parents of our own knowledge, learning, and religion, and it will rest upon us to settle whether we will preserve and understand the past, or whether we will deliberately let it be destroyed. You have not only to preserve that which you know, but to reserve the sites which are at present quite ignored, on which there is probably nothing visible to the unskilled eye. People understand, perhaps, the necessity of protecting ancient buildings, but they have never realised sufficiently how necessary it is to preserve the things that are at present invisible—buildings in the soil which are liable to be wiped out by people working for stone for building, or digging for the sake of plunder."

We may hope to find, it seems, the whole history of humanity in the East from the four or five civilisations before the Jewish occupation which we know of, and "to recover what we only at present have seen very little of—the civilisation of Elam, which underlies the early civilisation of Egypt. That is really the important end for the question, and for the origin of civilisation. It can only be done by the presence of trained archaeologists who can distinguish the various places most likely to be of importance. This visitation should be begun this very day, if possible, because it is perfectly certain that private rights in Palestine and Mesopotamia will arise now like mushrooms. I have seen it in Egypt and know what it means. What is required is a civilian staff for the management of the whole question of antiquities, and this staff ought to be under a board of skilled authorities—preferably, for Palestine, Jewish archaeologists."

The right lines of administration are excellently laid down, Prof. Petrie thinks, in the late Sir Stanley Maude's proclamation in Mesopotamia, by which the rights of the Ottoman Government in all antiquities are transferred to the new administration, and very explicit rules are laid down for the safeguarding of the relics of the past.

THE SOUTH CHESHIRE AND DISTRICT ASSOCIATION.

THE autumnal meetings of the Association were held in the Beech Street Free Christian Church, Crewe, on Thursday October 10. All the churches sent representatives. At the Business Meeting, the President, the Rev. A. E. O'Connor, in the chair, the Rev. Dr. Griffiths drew attention to the basis of the Y.M.C.A., and it was agreed that a letter be sent asking for information.

The devotional part of the service in the afternoon was taken by the President, and the sermon was preached by Mr. F. Maddison, Secretary of the International Arbitration League. After mentioning some of the things which, according to the prophets, were going to happen after the war, and also what was called the Trench view of religion, he said that in some directions Unitarianism had least need to change. Yet we had shown the least capacity to attract the thousands. Two or three things would be insisted on in the future: (1) Intellectual honesty in religion. It was as much a virtue to believe honestly as to do business honestly. (2) Worship must be a real and living thing. The Unitarian Church was not an Ethical Society, and the Church which was little more did not fill a real want. (3) Very little conception existed among some as to what constituted a Church. It should be a society of Jesus, the spiritual home of men and women. We had to create the ties which bind people to the churches. Our services should strengthen and console. We should not be afraid of emotion, nor should we neglect London for Jerusalem.

At the evening meeting Mr. Maddison spoke of 'The Place of Force in a League of Nations.' The idea of a League of Nations was not new. Plans for a world peace were formulated centuries ago by Henry IV. of France, by the Abbé St. Pierre, by William Penn, and in all these force found a place. Some other plans did not include the use of force. But there was something which was more important than peace. The only peace which could endure was that based on justice. War was better than a constant state of injustice. In his opinion the American scheme proposed by Mr. Taft and adopted by President Wilson was the best. It laid down a partnership of nations based on the equality of the smaller with the greater Powers. It would hold the world to peace by means of a guaranteeing force so great that none could withstand it. When law took the place of personal violence you gave law the power to do what personal violence did. That was the part force played in the League of Nations. All the plans spoke of a twofold force (1) economic, (2) military. Economic force meant force of the very worst kind. Our blockade of Germany had killed more Germans than Zeppelin and aeroplane bombs had killed in this country. Under the League of Nations it would never be used except as a war measure. The League of Nations was the outward expression of the feeling that brute force had failed, was wrong, and must be abolished. But it was not inconsistent to transfer force as the instrument of law to the hands of a Society of Nations. There were difficulties and dangers, but they had to remember the difficulties and dangers of the present system. Questions were asked by the Revs. J. Park Davies, D. J. Evans, and Mr. Kelsall, and were satisfactorily answered by Mr. Maddison.

SIR ALBERT STANLEY writes suggesting that Unitarians, among other religious people, might hold their services, so far as convenient, during the period of daylight in coming months, so as to help to overcome the urgent difficulty concerning the country's coal supply.

DR. CLIFFORD.

AMONG the numerous testimonies of respect sent to the Rev. Dr. Clifford this week was the following; its sentiment will be echoed by many ministers and friends in our churches generally: "The London Unitarian Ministers' Meeting beg to add their cordial congratulations to those which will be offered to Dr. Clifford from far and wide on the attainment of his Diamond Jubilee; they rejoice in the great services he has rendered so long to popular education, peace, good citizenship and practical Christianity in every form; they warmly recognise and appreciate his breadth of religious sympathy; and they trust that his closing years will be attended with every blessing from the Father of all."

THE Military Cross has been awarded to Capt. John Russell, second son of the late Hon. Rollo Russell. We have special pleasure that this gallant young soldier has done honour to the name he bears.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Bolton: Bank Street.—The minister of Bank Street Chapel, the Rev. J. Cyril Flower, is giving a series of fortnightly lectures on 'The Bible: its Literature, History and Teaching in the Light of Criticism.' They are designed to stimulate the intelligent reading, study and understanding of Biblical literature and teaching, and, according to the syllabus, will be continued until April 16, 1919.—The death as the result of wounds is announced in the Calendar of Trooper Sydney Hall, Lancers Regiment, aged 27, in hospital at Norwich, and Pte. Hermann Grossmann, Royal Garrison Artillery, aged 26, in hospital in France.

Bolton: Halliwell Road.—A successful Sale of Work in connection with the Unitarian Free Church was opened on October 2 by Mr. John Harwood, J.P., with Mr. Miles Gerrard in the chair. There was a very good attendance, and the sales were brisk. The proceedings were resumed on Saturday, October 5, when Sir Thomas Flitcroft (in the unavoidable absence through sickness of Lady Flitcroft) opened the Sale. Mrs. Swift presided. Despite war conditions and bad weather there was again a good attendance. The result of the two days' effort far exceeded expectations, the sum of £185 net being realised. On both days the speakers made encouraging references to the urgent need for a new and larger church. It is now hoped that as soon as possible a special effort will be made to erect a spacious and more beautiful building for worship. The attendances at the Sunday evening services are increasing, and the Sunday school is in a flourishing condition. Donations to the New Building Fund will be gratefully received by the minister, the Rev. A. O. Broadley, 61 Harper's Lane, Bolton.

Cambridge.—The services at Cambridge, which are held in the Assembly Hall, Downing Street, on Sundays at 11.30, will recommence on Sunday, October 20, when the Rev. Arthur Herbert Coar of Holyoke, Mass., U.S.A., will preach. Mr. Coar is in England in charge of educational work with the American Army. The secretary of the Cambridge congregation (Mr. W. L. Beale, 6 de Freville Avenue) will be glad to have the names of anyone coming to the University or visiting Cambridge, or of cadets or other members of the Army or R.A.F. stationed in the town who are likely to be interested in the services.

Coseley.—At the Annual Meeting of the Old Meeting House congregation which was held recently Mr. K. V. Ford was elected Secretary and Mr. E. Green Treasurer for the current year; Councillor W. Southall has since been elected Chairman of Committee. A resolution of confidence in the Minister, the Rev. W. G. Topping, and strong approval of the work upon which he is engaged, both in connection with the church and with the Ministry of Labour, was carried unanimously at a meeting of the Committee held a week ago.

Leeds: Hunslet.—Hunslet Unitarian Church will celebrate its Jubilee from October 27 to November 3. On Sunday, October 27, the Rev. E. Gwilym Evans of Dukinfield will preach in the evening, and there will be services on October 29 and 31, Dr. S. F. Duffon and the minister, the Rev. A. Leslie Smith, being the respective preachers. On Saturday, Nov. 2 the Rev. Dendy Agate will speak at a social gathering on 'The Foundation and History of the Hunslet Unitarian Church, its Past Workers, and its Relation to Religion To-day,' and he will also preach at the Evening Service on November 3. It is hoped that these meetings and services will bring a fresh and quickening spirit into the life of the church, and that past members and former scholars will take part in them, renewing old friendships and the happiness of communion in public worship.

Liverpool: Ullet Road.—The Rev. Lawrence Redfern writing from France to his congregation says: "The Y.M.C.A. organisation not only caters for the welfare of British and Colonial troops, but has also taken the Chinese under its wing. The Chinese Huts are manned by ministers and laymen who have been out in China on missionary and educational work, and therefore understand the Chinese and their peculiar needs. On two occasions in France I have known the extremity of human helplessness. The first was when the village where we were stationed was being shelled and one didn't know quite where to turn for the best. And the second was when I visited a Chinese Y.M.C.A. I had Chinese to right of me, Chinese to left of me, and Chinese all round me, and one Chinese word in my vocabulary with which to keep up the conversation. Well, of course, the conversation flagged. And I was heartily glad to get back to my own tent where English is spoken, though in many dialects. For in every centre there are gathered together day after day men from all parts of the British Isles, and sometimes from the more remote quarters of the Empire, men of different types and with different intellectual and moral standards, not saints nor angels, but MEN, and it must be a poor nature indeed which does not find itself braced and stimulated by fellowship with those who, in very truth, are bearing the sins of the past and giving their all for the generations to come."

Fallsworth.—The 106th Anniversary of the Sunday School in connection with Dob Lane Chapel was celebrated last Sunday, when the Rev. Charles Roper of West Kirby preached morning and evening, and addressed the scholars in the afternoon.—The Calendar records the death of Private W. Bayley, of the Lancashire Fusiliers, at a clearing station in France on August 20, nine days after being wounded while in action.

Halifax.—It is announced in the Northgate End Chapel Calendar that Private T. Taylor of the Royal Scots has died from wounds received in France. Strong of purpose and straightforward in all his conduct "his loyalty to conviction, and quiet dignity of manner, gave promise of the kind of life the community needs for the building up of a sane and progressive society." One of his brothers is a prisoner of war in Germany, the other is fighting in France.

Harvest Festivals.—Harvest Thanksgiving Services have been held at Southampton (October 6), preacher: the Rev. H. M. Livens; Mansford Street, London (October 13), preacher: the Rev. Gordon Cooper; Coseley (September 29), preachers: the Rev. G. H. Smith and Mr. N. Crabtree of Birmingham; Chester (October 6), preacher: the Rev. J. Horace Short; Croydon, Dennett Road (October 6), preacher: the Rev. D. Delta Evans.

London: Brixton.—The congregation of Effra Road Unitarian Church has lost a loyal supporter and energetic worker by the death of Mrs. Midlane, long connected with the Dorcas Society and Mothers' Meeting at Effra Road, and a faithful helper in the work at Blackfriars Mission. She left the mark of her high character and unselfish disposition on all with whom she came in contact.—The Calendar records that Mrs. Wright has received news of the death of her son who was serving as a wireless operator in the Navy, a young man on the threshold of life with the promise of a brilliant future before him. Mrs. de Negri has also lost her eldest son, and Mrs. Rodwell a brother.

London: Lewisham.—An interesting ceremony took place at the Unitarian Church on Sunday morning last. The late Sir Edwin Durning-Lawrence has always been recognised as a good friend and generous supporter of the church, and recently it was decided by the congregation to erect a tablet in his memory. Under the advice of Mr. Arnold Tayler, A.R.I.B.A., this was entrusted to the Artificers' Guild, who produced a tablet in beaten bronze with oak frame, bearing the inscription: "Erected by this Congregation in Memory of Sir Edwin Durning-Lawrence, Bart., 1837-1914. A Generous Benefactor and Friend to this Church." The tablet was unveiled by Lady Durning-Lawrence. The Rev. A. H. Dolphin conducted the service. At the close of his sermon, in which the services rendered by the Lawrence family and others were regarded as the outcome and fruit of the principle of Unitarianism (the text was "By their fruits ye shall know them"). Lady Durning-Lawrence unveiled the tablet and spoke of the message she believed Sir Edwin would have given to the congregation, a message of encouragement and hope and a call for loyalty to the simple but powerful doctrines of Unitarian Christianity. There was a large attendance of members and friends of the church.

Manchester.—The Christian Commonwealth this week, under the heading 'Are Unitarians Christians?' refers to the exclusion of Unitarians from the Council of Christian Congregations in Manchester and Salford, and hopes that this body "will rescind a decision which, in the light of all that is happening, borders on the ridiculous." Remarking that "there are, of course, Unitarians and Unitarians," our contemporary says: "Taking their general tendency and spirit, it is fair to say that their way of regarding Christ, and the implications of his life and teaching, contains no essential bar to practical and devotional fellowship" with those of the orthodox position. The Manchester District Association has issued a pamphlet, 'Brotherhood and Dogma,' giving the history of the case, and reproducing a clear and forcible address delivered by Mr. G. G. Armstrong at the Union Chapel Brotherhood, September 22, on the subject which forms the title of the pamphlet. There is also a copy of a letter from the Pendleton Free Church to the Council. An animated correspondence has appeared in the local press. The Christian World, in a second reference to the subject, confesses to "a feeling of shame" in the perusal of the pamphlet mentioned above; and after giving the particulars says: "Anyone who knows the record of Manchester and the district for generations past knows that Unitarians have been among the foremost, the most enlightened, and devoted and honoured of its citizens in promoting the objects for which the new Council is formed. They have on all grounds a clear right to be admitted—they ought indeed to be welcomed."

Manchester: Blackley.—On Saturday, October 12, a most successful Sale of Work was held in connection with the Unitarian Chapel, which was opened by Miss Dowson of Gee Cross in an interesting speech. The chair was taken by Mrs. Allan Crabtree, whose family have been most generous supporters of the cause. The Sale realised £120 after expenses were paid.

Nottingham.—For several Sundays past the congregation of the High Pavement Chapel has had the pleasure and advantage of being ministered to by three of our friends from the United States, the Rev. F. H. Kent, the Rev. A. B. Coar, and the Rev. G. A. Mark, to whom they are deeply indebted. "It has been no slight privilege," a correspondent writes, "to hear these leaders among our American churches, and to be strengthened by their robust Unitarianism." On Sunday, October 6, the Rev. Simon Jones commenced his ministry at the High Pavement, and was welcomed by large congregations, who look to the future of the chapel under his leadership with happy confidence.

Portsmouth.—On October 13 and 14 Portsmouth Unitarians and their friends celebrated the bicentenary of the High Street Chapel. At the Sunday services Dr. J. Estlin Carpenter officiated, speaking in the morning on 'The Nonconformist Inheritance and the Meaning of Freedom in Religion' and at night on 'Two Hundred Years of Religious Freedom.' On the Monday following the Southern Unitarian Association met at the chapel in the afternoon and many of the delegates remained for the evening meeting, when the chair was taken by Mrs. Cogan Conway, the President, and Dr. Carpenter, the Revs. H. Shaen Solly, V.D. Davis, and G. W. Thompson, minister of the chapel, spoke. The history of the past two hundred years, with all its heroic figures and its record of sacrifice and struggle and accomplishment for the truth, called in ringing notes of challenge for a yet greater endeavour in the era of reconstruction now dawning for the world. The work of preservation and restoration of the building is proceeding apace, and deep gratitude is felt owing to the fact that the ready and generous response made by the members of the church, and its friends in Portsmouth and throughout the country, to the recent appeal, renders it probable that the scheme will be completed without placing a burden of debt upon the church.

Sheffield: Attercliffe.—It is announced that Private L. Thacker, a member of the School and church, died of wounds in August in a French hospital.

Sheffield: Unity Church.—Evening services are being abandoned for the winter, and Sunday services will be held at 11 and 3.15.—Signaller Sydney Smith, at one time a member of the Church Committee, and Private W. Crane, a Sunday school boy, have been killed in action in France.

Sheffield: Upper Chapel.—An interesting series of Sunday evening lectures is being given by the Rev. C. J. Street on 'Ancient Legends and Modern Applications.' His subject next Sunday (October 20) will be 'The Garden of Eden.'

Southampton.—At the Church of the Saviour services will be held at 3.30 instead of 6.30 during the winter in order to save fuel and lighting.

Wakefield.—It is recorded in the Westgate Chapel Calendar that Private Ben Bower, Lancashire Fusiliers, aged 19 years, was killed in action on August 10. Out of 85 men on the Roll of Honour, 11 have been killed or have died of wounds or sickness, 1 is missing, and 2 have been prisoners in Germany since August, 1914.

Victoria, B.C.—The minister, the Rev. E. J. Bowden, writing in his September Calendar: says: "During the vacation I have visited most of the leading churches in the city. I have worshipped by the book with Anglicans and Roman Catholics: I have worshipped in the stillness with Quakers, who drew near to God with fifty minutes of silence and ten minutes of speech. In all I have found much to admire,—much to appreciate. Almost everywhere I have found a strong tendency towards liberal thought. Some churches... are busy packing their new wine into old bottles. They use the words and phrases of orthodoxy with a new meaning. Others are struggling to express their experience in weird allegory, or in pseudo-scientific terms which jangle strangely on ears attuned to classic models. Everywhere the yeast is working: its outward manifestations may be grotesque, but eventually the new life will find worthy forms. It will be a joy to return to our own worship. Our service is the result of a process of evolution, and in it we have attained much.... Believing as we do that all inspiring thought is from God we admit all literature that is helpful to devotion on an absolute equality with the Bible, giving to the Jewish Scriptures only the priority which belongs to their age and intrinsic worth. In this we stand alone among the churches of Victoria. Our gain is clear. The children who grow up amongst us will never be compelled to re-learn the lesson of faith. They will develop from the first with the roots of their religious life in modern thought; or rather in that thought which is universal,—common both to ancient and modern times."

Aberdeen.—The first lecture of the Open Platform Club was delivered in the Central Hall, Skene Street, on Friday evening, October 4, by Prof. J. Arthur Thomson, M.A., his subject being 'The Wonders of Animal Life.' The chair was occupied by the Rev. H. Dawtry. The main points of the lecture, viz.: the beauty of wild creatures in natural conditions, the insurgence of life, and the wonderful adaptations of colour, form, and function, were beautifully illustrated with lantern slides. There was a very appreciative audience, which filled the hall. Mr. H. H. Duncan moved, and Bailie George seconded, a motion of thanks. The lantern was operated by Mr. Cruickshank. The membership of the Club already stands at about a hundred and the prospects seem very promising.

The Rev. T. P. Spedding.—The Executive Committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, at their meeting on October 9, 1918, unanimously adopted the following Resolution:—

"That in recording the resignation of the Rev. T. P. Spedding, Missionary Agent of the Association, consequent upon his acceptance of an invitation to become Minister of the congregation at Mansfield, the Executive Committee desire to express their warm appreciation of the enterprise and zeal which he displayed in organising and superintending the Unitarian Van Mission from its inception in 1905 until the outbreak of war in 1914, which rendered its continuance practically impossible. Mr. Spedding's visitations of the Home Camps was welcomed by the soldiers connected with our churches and schools; while his missionary labours as the representative of the Association were largely instrumental in restoring to activity several congregations that had become nearly moribund; and in various other ways, during the past eleven years, he rendered useful service to the Association and to the Unitarian movement. Mr. Spedding carries with him to his new sphere of labour the respect and good wishes of all who were associated with him in a common work at Essex Hall."

NOTES OF THE WEEK:

All letters and manuscripts for the Editor should be sent to 13 Bream's Buildings, Fetter Lane, London, E.C.4. They must reach the Editor not later than Wednesday morning for publication the same week.

THE Inter-Allied Parliamentary Committee which has been meeting in London this week in conference with the British Section, of which Lord Bryce is Chairman, undoubtedly represents a valuable movement and well deserved its welcome by King George. Officials, it is true, naturally look askance on the efforts of irresponsible outsiders, and there is need of caution lest over-weening busybodies should meddle with the machine. But there is much more need of reciprocal good feeling based on personal intercourse and associated action, especially when men of recognised weight in their respective legislatures are the co-workers. Any League of Nations must be greatly strengthened by the mutual knowledge resulting from these conferences.

* * *

THERE was a reference in the King's address to the French section of this Committee recalling the many wars that have been waged between their nation and ours. Admitting that they had not only been many but often severe, the address expressed a view that they had been waged chivalrously and had not been embittered beyond the power of reconciliation. Lord Morley tells us in his 'Recollections' that on one occasion Nelson wrote declaring his wish to shoot every Frenchman and Frenchwoman, from which little incident we may infer that the feeling was bitter enough then. And yet we are conscious that in His Majesty's mind there was a recognition of that apparently quite insurmountable repugnance which the Germans have created for themselves. Whether the children's teeth will permanently be set on edge by the sour grapes the fathers have eaten, who shall say!

LORD MILNER has had the somewhat unusual experience of praise from old opponents and blame from old friends in consequence of certain remarks to an interviewer respecting our attitude towards the German people. Evidently he is not only affected by his knowledge of the worthier types in that nation, crediting them with opinions on war and peace which certainly have not been much manifested, but also by his fear lest anarchy should follow the downfall of the Hohenzollerns as it has that of the Romanoffs. To do him justice, Lord Milner has always had the courage of his convictions, even when the "consequences" have been more formidable than a little unpopularity; and critics in the extreme section of his political associates may well consider whether Bolshevism is not a peril considerably west of Russia.

* * *

THE replies of the various representatives of the religious bodies to Sir Albert Stanley's suggestions that, in order to economise fuel, services should not be held in the dark hours, can hardly have surprised him. While there has been every desire on the part of reasonable and patriotic church-goers to co-operate with the authorities in relieving the difficulty which confronts them and the nation in regard to the coal supply, the natural criticism has been that while places of amusement use up much more fuel and illuminants than churches no suggestion appears to be made that they should be closed. So far as this reflection savours of unholy jealousy it is to be deprecated, but apart from the comparative value to the nation of reverence and recreation, and merely as a matter of supply and consumption, it is surely worth the attention of our Controllers. But everybody really ought to economise as much as possible in every way, and we have no fear of extravagance in our own group of congregations, at any rate.

THE Rev. H. Gow's impressive and interesting words on another page, especially those which refer to his recent work in France, will be read with much attention by his friends and our public generally. We are not surprised to hear that he is so deeply persuaded of the unique opportunities presented by this work that he wishes to resume it as soon as may be arranged. The absence of such men is a great loss to us at home; and in Mr. Gow's case it is a loss to this journal which cannot easily be made up. But we shall all wish him and his colleagues in the work to feel our warmest sympathies are with them, and our grateful confidence in their efforts to help and guide our brothers and sons out there.

* * *

THERE is a "Poets' Corner" in Westminster Abbey, and another in one of the Huts used by troops from America and the British Dominions. The latter, we were informed on a recent visit, is the place where men are laid to sleep off their intoxication. "Have you many of these?" we asked. "Too many, a good many," was the reply. Further inquiries elicited the information that most of them are American sailors—who are presumably used to drinking—and Canadian lads, who certainly are not. How very discreditable to them to come all the way across the Atlantic for this new acquirement; and how vastly more discreditable to England, the parents will say, that she provides the means!

* * *

WHEN one is disposed, now and then, to complain of delays in postal deliveries, he may to his profit in patience reflect on the quite enormous work done by the postal service for the men in the Forces. Millions of letters and parcels go and come every week, and while our business and other correspondence here is no doubt important there is no measuring its claim by the side of the messages that pass over to and from the lines of war. How indefatigable the officials are in following up the troops in their advances, now so rapid in Flanders for instance, and recently in Syria and the Salonika front, we have good proof in the covers—such as those of the Lawrence House Bulletin—that occasionally return to the senders, after unavailing search. Some of these deserve to be preserved as curiosities, and something more; stamped all over with marks of field offices far and wide, and with records of suggestion by ingenious and tireless minds, they afford a glimpse of the marvellous organisation created and maintained during these years.

IN GRATEFUL TOKEN.

SIR DOUGLAS HAIG's dispatch brings before us two things, each unforgettable, though for very different reasons. On the one hand there is the story of the grave disaster to the British arms last spring, a disaster (say the experts) beyond anything ever experienced before by our forces. That it did not prove overwhelming and final, as the desperate enemy hoped, was due to the other for ever memorable fact—the splendid courage and self-sacrifice of our soldiers. To use an Americanism, we cannot so much as begin to measure our debt for all they have endured on our behalf. Half-a-year has rolled away, and what a marvellous change has occurred! Before the allied armies the enemy is retreating beaten, he asks humbly for an armistice, he longs for peace. In one city after another scenes of tumultuous joy are witnessed as the inhabitants recover their freedom from a crushing tyranny. The line of coast that threatened England so long has been cleared, and the raids appear to be a closed chapter.

With the leave of our American brethren, while we know that all we can do in return is the merest trifle in comparison with what has been done for us, we must "begin" to repay our debt as well as we can, were it only in token. The various noble efforts appealing to us for aid must not, do not, appeal in vain. Now, the merging of our contributions in these general funds is excellent. These practical things are the things that unite us; and Unitarians, who have never cherished sectarian prejudices in their philanthropy, are certainly not likely to change to-day. Rather they will delight afresh to feel that, though here and there the ancient petty feuds are kept up to our injury—were that possible—there is room for us all in the work of help. At the same time, we have our own special opportunities of showing honour, gratitude, and affection for the troops.

Thus, in the first place, Lawrence House wants money—not to carry on the Hostel work: that, thanks to generous provision already made, supplemented by a great deal of untiring voluntary service, is fairly secure—but to reach by post the thousands who cannot find their way homeward at present. Mrs. Sydney Martineau, writing on behalf of the zealous band of workers who have made this thing a real success, has told us that some £400 is needed in order to print and send out the Christmas Bulletin and the one following—shall we dare to say, the Victory issue? However that may be, the men for whom we can do so little must at least be assured that we lovingly remember them—not only those who belong to our respective families, churches, and schools, but all our brethren who in the strength of our grand faith and in the light of our triumphant hope are so well doing what we at home cannot do at all. A third of the sum named is already raised; surely a week or two will suffice to gather in the rest. What is the amount named, after all, to people really in earnest!

There is another special claimant for our warm and practical sympathy—

"THE INQUIRER'S OWN," let us proudly call it. If anything were needed to quicken the flow of subscriptions into this well-worn channel surely the record of the Belgians and their valiant King will do it. But we have an account to give respecting the Belgian Fund which is far too important to be huddled up into a sentence or two, and we propose to set it forth more adequately next week. Those faithful and generous supporters who have multiplied their gifts, whether of money or goods, during these years will not need fresh stimulus to continuance in well doing. It is their due, however, to be told more fully than can always be done the scope and value of the work they have been assisting so long. But we have in mind, we candidly confess, the very casual helpers and those who have, for one reason or other, hitherto stood out, and—though there is a proverb which says "Vain is the net spread in the sight of any bird"—we are bold enough to believe that in these days of high and unselfish emotion there are many of our readers who will prove not at all unwilling to be caught. At any rate, we shall try them—with the aid of a little device invented for the occasion, and with the recital of facts more potent than any devices.

Meanwhile, as practical and business-like people, let us clear the Lawrence House Fund quickly out of the way. Mrs. Martineau and her co-workers will not demur to summary treatment.

THE DEAD AND THE LIVING.

By the Rev. HENRY GOW, Rosslyn Hill.

And these all, having had witness borne to them through their faith, received not the promise, God having provided some better thing concerning us, that apart from us they should not be made perfect.—Hebrews xi. 39-40.

THAT is at first sight a strange and unfamiliar thought. We often feel we need our dead. We long for the joy of their presence, for the comfort of their words and loving thoughts; we want to see them and to help them and to plan for them as we used to do; we miss them more sometimes when we think of the little things that we could do for them which we can do no longer, than when we think of what they did for us. It is the yearning, unselfish love, longing to do something for the dead, ever unsatisfied, thrown back into lonely impotence, and saying to itself "I can do nothing for him now" which is the hardest thing to bear. It is hard not to be helped by our loved ones, but it is harder still not to be able to help them any more. All the thoughts and hopes and efforts which clustered round their lives seem vain and empty now. The busy cares and tendings of parents, wives and sisters are no longer needed. We think of them as wanting nothing more from us in that new wonderful life of the spirit.

It is a higher thought which is given us in our text: God having provided some better thing concerning us, that they without us should not be made perfect. They need us still for the fulfilment of their aims and the ideals for which they died. They have not only given their lives for us. They are not separated from us by a great gulf until we too cross into that other land. Their peace and joy depend upon the way we use their gift. We and they are one family on earth and in heaven, we still need one another and depend upon one another and love one another; here as there we can still help one another in the fulfilment of our common aims.

I.

When those of our sailors and soldiers who are left return to us again, when we rejoice with them at the victory obtained, there must be for us and them the feeling of that myriad multitude of men who have died in order that the end may be achieved. Many of us will feel the reality of that army of martyrs more deep and true than the noise of bells and the waving of flags. They too will participate in the result obtained. The peace we make must be one which we can feel that they, with their larger tolerance and deeper insight can approve. The way we bear ourselves in victory must be a way in which we can feel that they look down upon with joy and gratitude. We want to feel that our dead can say as they see the end of this war, and the spirit in which we use our victory, "Thank God, my death has not been all in vain."

We are nearing the end of the greatest world tragedy in history. It may be weeks, it may be months, no one can say, before peace is made, and we all feel the duty of firm persistence until the end is gained; but hope burns brightly in our hearts; we are confident of the result as far as outward victory is concerned.

The change is almost incredible in the last few months since I spoke last in this congregation. Then it seemed vain and even weak to talk or think about the end: we could only just go on with patient courage and wait and bear. We felt like one of our soldiers in exile and danger in a foreign land who has many months of toil in front of him and who hardly dares to think of his return or dwell upon the joy of it. And then, as days and weeks go on and the time of his return draws near, he can let himself dwell on the quiet familiar places round his home and the faces of his friends and the joy of being with them once again. We can dwell to-day upon the coming peace and the removal of the awful weight of war with joy and thankfulness, but without any relaxation of effort. Nay, I think the last weeks for every man who has been away from those he loves are often the most full of effort. He wants to do the utmost that he can and to look back with a sense of satisfaction on the work which was committed to his hands. And so now, when we feel that the end of this world tragedy is drawing near, when we seem to see the hills and fields of home looming through the mist, there ought to be in all of us more strength and confidence to press on to the end and to finish the work so that a lasting peace may be secured.

But we must remember that it is a great and awful tragedy in which we have been living and suffering. A Tragedy is a story which ends badly; it is a story of waste and loss and sorrow in which great and noble lives are lost, in which injustice is done and cannot be retrieved. In a great Tragedy evil is punished, and rightly punished; but the punishment of evil is no compensation for the death of the pure and good. The deaths of Goneril and Regan do not make up for the death of Cordelia. The death of Iago does not make up for the deaths of Desdemona and Othello. We cannot clap our hands and simply rejoice that everything is right at the end of a Tragedy. When stern righteous retribution comes upon the wrong-doer, we cannot feel that this makes all well again. The total effect of a great Tragedy is not to fill us with joy and satisfaction as we watch the sufferings of the guilty. The end of a great Tragedy is to fill us with a sense of the eternal worth of love and goodness and to make us feel that the suffering of the true and noble is a vindication of the power and beauty of love. We recognise that retribution on the guilty is right and necessary, but the tragic effect consists not in dwelling upon the satisfaction of justice but on the glory of love and self-sacrifice.

And so in this great world tragedy of ours, while we recognise that there ought to be stern retribution for the guilty, that it is coming and must come, if we dwell on that merely, or mainly, we are not feeling it rightly. I do not envy the man who could feel happy and contented, when his son or brother has been killed, in watching the death of his murderer, and who can say "Now I am at peace, now my son is at peace." Retribution may be just and right, but it does not make up to us for the loss of those we love. The conquest of evil, the punishment of evil will not give us back our dead. They did not die in order to be revenged. They ask of us something quite other than the spirit of revenge. The end of our victory is, not punishment of the guilty, but the fulfilment of the aims for which they lived and died. It is not a return to quiet lives and freedom from anxiety: it is a stern noble conflict for justice and liberty and love among all the nations upon earth for which they longed. It is not wild cruel joy in punishing the guilty and gaining an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth which must be ours, no mere feeling of relief that the awful burden of the suffering and violence of war are past. It is the spirit of the men who have died that we need, not satisfaction for their deaths. We may feel that Christ's murderers ought to have been punished, but it would have made no difference to the death of Christ, and I doubt if it would have made any difference to the progress of Christianity. The victory of Christ did not depend upon any retributive justice on his murderers, it depended upon the effect of his life and love and sacrifice upon his followers, and their feeling of his claim upon their lives. Real victory for us and for our dead can only come if our lives are made purer, stronger, nobler through the thought of those who have suffered and died for us, and if outward victory is felt as an opportunity, a challenge, a claim to something higher for which our young men would have striven if they were living still upon earth.

II.

It is no wild hope of a better future with which we look out to-day; beyond the hope of external victory we look out into a world of men and women whose hearts have been purified by suffering, and on whom the dead have laid a sacred and a splendid responsibility. Outward victory will only be the beginning of a great and glorious task. Our dead bid us face it without fear or doubt, they ask us to fulfil their ideals, to complete what they had just begun.

And for all of us who have seen the spirit of the soldiers to-day and shared something of their thoughts, the future is full of hope. Many of you who have worked in hospitals or canteens at home know it as well as I. When I went among our soldiers in France, far away as I was from the noise and danger of battle—almost as far as I am now—I felt strange and shy and in the presence of men who had seen sights I had never seen, faced dangers I had never faced and suffered things which I had never suffered. The sense of strangeness and of shyness passed away: I found them responsive, simple, very human and willing to be friends. But I never lost that feeling of reverence and of inferiority in the presence of men bearing so patiently hardships I had never known, sleeping on bare boards or on the ground, doing uncongenial tasks in the iron grip of an organisation which did with them what it chose, liable to injustice from which there was no appeal. These men bore on their bodies, like St. Paul, the marks of the Lord Jesus. Their courage, their humour, their patience are beyond words to describe. The more I see of their self-control, their endurance, their instinct for order, their chivalry, the more confident I become of the future of our country. Their hatred of war, their love for home and wife and child, their resolve that liberty and justice shall prevail, these are powers unseen but tremendous which are going to work for the healing of the nations. And I was impressed, as every man must be in France, with the power of religion and the breakdown of all denominational barriers. We ministers were known for what we were, Church of England, Baptist, Presbyterian, Unitarian, but we worked together on a level of equality, and for the men it made no difference. They care neither for doctrinal orthodoxy nor for doctrinal heterodoxy, but they do care for the simple human and religious truths which are at the heart of Christianity. The opportunity for our form of faith when it is affirmative and not negative is greater than I ever realised before.

True religion is not something alien and apart from these men's lives: they need it, they are willing to receive it. They know that the future depends upon a deeper faith. Through sorrow and suffering they have felt the eternal power of love. About them too is the memory and the inspiration of the dead.

It is a great and wonderful future which lies before us. Our dead have revealed to us the beauty and glory of self-sacrifice and love and they claim us for the service in which they gave their lives. We can make the world, with the help of God, a better place than it has ever been before. The desire for peace and harmony and justice and love was never so strong in the hearts of men as it is to-day. The power of religion, the message of the Cross, of self-sacrifice and courage was never so much needed and so certain of finding a response. Our dead call to us to carry on their work and to fulfil their ideals, and the thought of their love and their sacrifice fills us with a deep and strong resolve. God helping us, as He will help us, as He does help us, we can and will make our lives and the lives of others better and more beautiful, and through them we will work and strive and suffer in confident expectation of a nobler, brighter day.

BOOKS AND REVIEWS.

THE CHRIST RE-MIRRORED.

It was said of Emerson that he was a friend and aider of all who would live in the spirit. It may be said also of Mr. A. Clutton-Brock, whose style partly resembles Emerson's, "announcing" rather than "arguing." Many of his essays in The Times Literary Supplement have brought a welcome note to many, especially in those early months of the war when faith was wavering and most preaching in vain for some of us. No doubt, at least we hope there is no doubt, his book 'The Ultimate Belief' is gratefully known by readers of these lines. Some, too, will recall his essays in several volumes issued by groups of pioneer thinkers on religious topics, notably one on the life to come.

With high expectation, therefore, men and women of a thoughtful turn, though alert and critical, will open his latest book. It bears a title closely similar to one of Martineau's early works, but more than the sixty years between that and this* divides one from the other. Setting aside the question of the intellectual difference between their respective authors there are many signs that the world of Christian thought has altered greatly since 1858. Mr. Clutton-Brock calmly utters opinions and uses expressions which would have been startling, not to say shocking, to our fathers; but no one cries out now. He adopts a method far alien from that of the students of two generations ago. It is not simply different from that of the laborious 'Lives' of Christ which surveyed the whole field of scripture and tradition, analysing, comparing, and balancing the evidence. It has kinship perhaps with the underlying temper of the writers of 'Ecce Homo' and the 'Vie de Jésus,' but there is here no disposition to set forth a history even in brief. What is presented is an effect; and whatever may be inferred from it as to the facts of the gospel story is quite obviously secondary in importance to the significance of that effect.†

"The Gospels, in their sincerity, even when it may be mistaken," says the author, "have given us enough to set the imagination working securely." There is much courage in that "securely"! "Christ himself, we know, was not invented," he continues. "He was and is himself. And so those who are in love with Christ know what is Christian when they see it; and this Christian quality is to them the first reality of the Christian faith." He declares there is for such "even a Christian beauty," recognisable to the initiate. "We find it in Rembrandt, but not in Raphael; the Renaissance said good-bye to it firmly and proudly, and therefore the Renaissance is a little tiresome to us. There is nothing of it in many of Shakespeare's plays; but we know how Hamlet, if he could have met Christ, would have turned to him, and how Christ would have cured him of his fever.... But there is most of this Christian beauty in King Lear; there are places where one can almost see Christ pass like a spirit through the play and cast a beauty upon it which Shakespeare had never dreamed of before."

This, it will be perceived, is not ordinary talk about the subject. Mr. Clutton-Brock has just subjected his own nature to the impact of the "reality" which he feels in Christ and lets the result be its own guarantee. "Christ," he says, "was not a philosopher; if you speak of his teaching you seem to do him wrong, as if you spoke of the teaching of Mozart. He does not prove to us, he reveals; and what we say is not even—That is true, but—That is what I wish to be. And to be that does not seem impossible. Those who insist on the impossible perfection of Christ have never seen the reality of him. He is possible because he is real; and because he is real, he is ourselves. For whenever any one is utterly real to us, he is ourselves, projected into different circumstances; he is every man. Every one is Hamlet to himself and every Christian is Christ, if only he could be Christ; and the unreality is the fact that he fails to be Christ. It is always ourselves, the everyman is most intensely ourselves, that we recognise in the convincing truth of art. I recognise myself, my own glorified experience, in 'The Magic Flute'; and all art, until I can do that with it, is to me merely something to be admired."

† We confine ourselves to the section of the book dealing specially with this subject, though the others are no less suggestive.

We think a careful reader will perceive there is matter here for consideration. If he will but turn to these pages for himself we promise him, not agreement always, but always challenge, and frequently profound suggestion. They touch on one aspect and another of the story, but always to come back to the "revealing" touch of Christ. His great powers do not daunt but reassure us. "He does not make his state of being hard to us but easy, not mysterious but simple. You can do it yourselves if you will, he says—The Kingdom of Heaven is within you. No doubt he said that suddenly, in a moment, when he saw that all men were one, one with him and he with them. And his great sayings all convince us that they were said so. They cannot be great sayings at all to those for whom they are official utterances; nor can he be himself to those who think of him as having said everything officially and out of his divine past rather than in his human present."

So we might go on quoting, but as our object is to send the reader to the book we content ourselves with one more extract, which will probably be specially interesting to people of a Unitarian type or tendency. It is an admirable specimen of the author's method. We leave it without comment to seek what reflection it may find in the mind that peruses it. At least, we shall admit, the light that lived in Gospel story once and mirrored itself in the faithful of old time is still able to shine in upon the souls of modern men. They still glow in its rays according to their nature.

"If Christianity now renews itself," says Mr. Clutton-Brock, "and lives again in joy and pride and laughter and tears, there will soon be an end of all dispute among Christians about the divinity of Christ. Those who called him God did so for reasons, whether good or bad, that are now meaningless. The bad reason was that they wished to give him an authority outside himself and his own words. They were partisans for him and would prove that he had no rivals; or they did not believe him or understand him enough to take him on his own merits. They needed proofs, like Thomas. The good reason was the sense of his supreme reality, and the desire to believe that God was real like him, was indeed utterly a person and not a celestial process; and the belief that Christ was God did itself exalt men's conception of God. But, though that reason was good once, it is not good now; for the belief in the divinity of Christ has done its work. It has made us dare the thought that we are all sons of God because of our likeness to Christ, and sons not by metaphor but in reality. God, for all those who really believe in Him now, is always a person, never a process; and He is better, not worse, than man. It is by the best in ourselves, in Christ, that we know Him. If there is a God, we are the sons of God; and Christ is one of us. He has his authority for us because he is utterly one of us and not because he is in any way different; and the more he is himself to us, the less authority or status he needs, whether human or divine."

PHILOSOPHY AND RELIGION.

THE second edition of Mr. Thomas Whittaker's book on the Neo-Platonists* suffers from "appendicitis," for the natural man has a natural repugnance to go on reading half a book more after he has finished the "Conclusion," even as he becomes restive under the preacher's "one word more" which sometimes follows the "finally and lastly." This is not meant to suggest that the Appendix should be removed but rather that it should be embodied in the story, if a third edition be demanded, for the exposition of Proclus, the great schoolman of the Neo-Platonists, which it contains is too important for an Appendix. It is also unfortunate for Proclus that he should have set forth so much original matter in the form of commentaries on Plato's dialogues. He would have been better known and esteemed if he had "come in his own name," but as he happened to live in the scholastic fifth century he was led into the humbler paths of a scholar rather than a philosopher.

Mr. Whittaker considers that the best remedy for the "dispersive specialism" of to-day is "the study of some all-comprehensive system, modern or ancient, positivist or idealist, the system of Comte or the system of Proclus. Such a study is not only astringent but emancipating. For the modern anarchy of endless specialism is an anarchy without liberty. It means that industrialism has led science captive. A renewed sense of wholeness is at the same time a renewed sense of freedom" (pp. 232-3).

Professor Harnack considers that the neo-Platonist, Proclus, was a great influence for a thousand years and both created and nourished the Christian mysticism of the Middle Ages; but Mr. Whittaker lays stress on the fact that Proclus was much less of the pure mystic than his predecessor Plotinus. Plotinus had exalted the intuitive reason which apprehends the absolute whole, whereas Proclus relied on the discursive reason which attends in turn to the various objects of science and makes use of logic and system. But although Proclus belonged to a different school of Neo-Platonism (the Athenian not the Alexandrine) he was at one with Plotinus in accepting and setting forth the position of idealism, that is, he was not content with the various special sciences as if they said the last "positive" word. Indeed, although Mr. Whittaker writes as an admirer of Comte, the founder of Positivism, he is sufficiently independent to suggest that his leader did not correctly describe the usual order of human development when he laid down the stages—myth, metaphysics, science; for that was not even Comte's own development, since what he really ended with was not positive science but a form of idealism which appears (1) as logic which he finally thought was necessary to a study of the philosophy of mathematics, and (2) as his "subjective synthesis" which came after what he regarded as the highest of the sciences, namely, morality (p. 208).

Something must be said of Mr. Whittaker's power and grasp as an historian of philosophy as well as a most careful and conscientious interpreter of the text of Plotinus and Proclus. The short chapter on the 'Stages of Greek Philosophy' is a wonderfully fine summary and the account given in another chapter of the relation between the pagan philosophy and Christianity is very suggestive, as when our author claims that Christians with their belief in supernatural angels and demons were just as polytheistic as the pagans, and that the Christian idea of a suffering God was common enough among non-Christian people though not among the philosophers.

* The Neo-Platonists. By Thomas Whittaker. Second Edition. Cambridge University Press. 12s. net.

The real "polemic against Christianity" conducted by men like Celsus and the Roman Emperor Julian was against the more or less political aims of Christianity to become world-embracing; whereas the pagan attitude was that every form of religion ought to be allowed and even encouraged, instead of forcing (as Christianity was becoming strong enough to do) widely different nations into the same faith. National religions ought to be preserved, said Julian, as useful and as containing adumbrations of truth. To express this truth adequately is the business of philosophy, not of popular religion. Philosophy is to be perfectly free and cosmopolitan, whereas religion is local and customary, ancestral and moral (p. 141). The philosopher should be the common hierophant of the world, said Proclus (p. 159).

The psychology of Plotinus ("perceptions are energies, not impressions or passive states") suggests modern volitional theories and pragmatism. Freedom is described by the same thinker as unimpeded activity such as we ascribe to the gods, and he replies effectively to the objection that this is being enslaved to one's own nature. Plotinus's theory that the soul becomes evil because of its mixture with matter is improved upon by Proclus, who had a truer perception of the implication of the will in any evil act. Proclus believed in the perpetuity of the world as against the Christian doctrine of creation. But this freedom of criticism was put an end to by the Christian Emperor Justinian, who closed the schools of philosophy where most young Christians had received their general education, and confiscated their private endowments.

Harnack speaks of Neo-Platonism as intellectually bankrupt, but against this we may set Mr. Whittaker's statement on p. 209: "The Neo-Platonic thought is metaphysically the maturest thought the European world has seen....modern time has nothing to show comparable to a continuous quest of truth during a period of intellectual liberty that lasted for a thousand years. What it has to show during a much shorter period of freedom consists of isolated efforts bounded by the national limitations of its philosophical schools. The essential ideas therefore of Plotinus and Proclus may still be worth examining in no merely antiquarian spirit."

STOPFORD BROOKE AND MR. CHESTERTON.

THE FATHERHOOD OF GOD.

To the April number of The Hibbert Journal Mr. Chesterton contributed a memorial article on Stopford Brooke, in which, after describing the vivid personality of the preacher and champion of liberty, he concludes with a judgment on the bearings of his doctrine which prompts a word of comment.

Stopford Brooke, Mr. Chesterton says, was more of a poet than a philosopher. That, no doubt, is true. He did not care much for abstruse reasonings nor for doctrinal argument, and his teaching from the first was based on his clear vision of fundamental spiritual truth, his faith in goodness, and in the power of love as supreme in God and man. But that did not mean that he was indifferent to reason. He had strenuously thought out his position, as Dr. Jacks notes, in his 'Life and Letters of Stopford Brooke,' but in him the union of thought and feeling was profound. He believed what he loved and loved what he believed. His doctrine was the expression of his inmost nature. The passion of his life as a preacher was to be free to work out all the implications of his faith, on the foundation of what he felt to be absolute truth. The story of his theological development from the evangelical faith of his early years, through the independent course he took as a clergyman of the Church of England, to his final stand in close affinity to the Unitarian position in the fellowship of a free religious life, is simply the story, Dr. Jacks says, "of a strong personality passing on to fuller and freer forms of self-expression. All that Brooke came finally to proclaim as the essence of religion may be traced back to his earlier utterances, where it will be found mingled with the orthodoxy in which he had been brought up. This steadily diminished as time went on. As his self-expression developed it became more and more evident that he was unable to do justice to himself through the forms of any accepted system of theology. What we have to watch, therefore, is not the logical growth of one idea from another, but the gradual dropping off of everything which could not be wrought into harmony with his original intuition of Love as the Master-principle of life" (p. 313).

In the first sermon he preached, as a young man of 24, on taking up his first curacy in London, he said: "Christ came to reveal the Fatherhood of God, and the Sonship of all men; and if we are all sons in him, we are all brothers one to another." And when thirty-eight years later he closed his regular ministry at Bedford Chapel, he spoke of the joy and eagerness with which from Sunday to Sunday he had preached "the good news of the love of God the Father as told to us by Jesus Christ, the life of love to one another which follows on that gospel, and the irradiation by it of every sphere of human life in this world and the world beyond." Then on the eve of the last Christmas of his long life, in 1915, when he was 83, he sent his good wishes to an old friend, including in them "the love of the Father, deep communion with Christ—his peace passing understanding and his love." "If we have these things," he added, "we may rejoice though the nations so furiously rage together and the cloud of pain lies deep over England; for I know that the Lord sitteth above the waterfloods. I hope the day will be bright and sunny for you, and warm your bones and your heart, and enliven your soul with high thought and love. The weather has troubled my old body, and I have many thoughts, yet here [in his Surrey home] we still believe in the coming of Spring, and prove our faith by planting daffodils and tulips and roses, and abiding in their imagined beauty. I love to think of hundreds of them waiting quietly for their beautiful life, when they hear the gay footfall of Spring, and hear her singing the ancient, ancient song. You and I are waiting also for the resurrection of our youth."

That, from first to last, was the tenor of his faith, "rooted and grounded in love," believing always the best, with a sure conviction and a great joy in life. Thus it was no negative residue of faith, resulting from a long process of critical destruction, to which he came in his affirmation of the true Fatherhood of God and the consequent brotherhood of man, it was from the first the spontaneous utterance of a healthy nature, the direct vision or intuition of a spirit alive to the power of truth, beauty, and goodness—a very positive and sufficing faith.

It is on this that Mr. Chesterton, at the conclusion of his article, makes an extraordinary, and, as it seems to me, a very perverse comment. He speaks of Stopford Brooke, indeed, as a pioneer of freedom in religion, but on a line of progress that leads nowhere. Any further progress of thought beyond that affirmation of the Fatherhood of God he cannot conceive as possible, except on the line of denial, an impoverishment of faith, which would not be progress. "His affirmations," Mr. Chesterton says, "are too absolute to be developed and too simple to be extended.... There is no path that way.... Stopford Brooke stands on a peak; but he stands on a precipice. He stood and stands securely; but beyond him there is no step, save into the void which he most deeply disdained." Mr. Chesterton is speaking confessedly in allegory, and the use of such images opens the way to various applications and may easily be misunderstood; but as regards the statement that the affirmation of the true Fatherhood of God is too absolute to be developed, it may be asked why any further development should be looked for, if this is a truth ultimate and all-sufficing, as we feel it to be, and as Stopford Brooke acknowledged it, covering the whole of life and meeting every human need? The supreme truths are the simplest and most universal, and what we have to do is not to look for progress beyond their range, but to rest in them, to live by them, and to enter more and more completely into the depth and sufficiency of their meaning.

This picturing of the man on a peak, but at the same time on the edge of a precipice, is no doubt a striking piece of rhetoric; but very different is the impression left by the closing scenes of the life which Dr. Jacks has so happily recorded for us. What we there see is, on the contrary, one who rests in a beautiful old age, wise and gracious, with joy in all things pure and lovely, and a heart full of worship, thankfulness, and gladness. He is resting in green pastures, and is led beside still waters of the deeper life of trust and love, very sure, as Jesus was, that the Divine goodness and mercy must avail to bring mankind into the true fold of the Father's care. With the confidence of one who sees and knows he bids us rejoice and be unafraid. We are to believe in goodness and love, to open our hearts to them, and so realise the immortal possibilities of life for us all, as children of God.

But if we ask further what Mr. Chesterton really means by his peak and precipice, perhaps we shall find the answer in another extraordinary statement he makes, when he says of Unitarian theologians that they "have looked up" with incomparable clearness and nobility of worship to a veritable and perfect Father; but one that had no Son." Is this then the precipice, imagined on the ground of that old metaphysical puzzle, which the orthodox doctrine of the Trinity is supposed by some to have solved? Is it that the Eternal, if he is veritably Father, must from all eternity have had a Son, who therefore is eternal too, very God of very God? If that is the precipice threatening the Unitarian's faith, there is a worse pit-fall at the Trinitarian's feet, unless his "society" in the Godhead is given such reality as spells the heresy of Tri-theism. For otherwise, the love which is described as eternally subsisting in the ultimate Unity of the Godhead can be only self-love, which can hardly be the object of our highest worship.

The fact is that in such attempts to comprehend and define the Infinite and Eternal we are straining beyond the powers of our thought, and trespassing where we have no right or spiritual capacity to walk. Of love we have positive knowledge, and in the realm of our spiritual life it is matter of experience that it is greatest of all. That is how we know that God is love, and because of what he is to us, in the profoundest experiences of our human life, most deeply realised in our fellowship with Christ, as we share with him the true spirit of sonship, we understand that we are children of God. He is our Father, and that suffices. There is no precipice, but a complete and quiet "rest in the Lord."

MEMORIAL NOTICE.

THE REV. J. LLOYD JONES.

THE death of the Rev. J. Ll. Jones, of Chicago, to which we referred last week, occurred on September 12, after a long and painful illness. With characteristic courage and persistence he worked on till within a few days of the end, and attended eagerly to editorial arrangements of Unity up to the evening before he died. The issue of the journal for August 29, had been suspended by the authorities, presumably on account of the opinions expressed; a telegram releasing it for posting came, to his great joy, on his last morning. At the funeral, September 14, which was largely attended, Dr. G. B. Foster of Chicago University, Dr. John Faville of Appleton, and Miss Zona Gale of Portage gave addresses. Dr. Foster who specially recalled his activities in the Congress of Religions 1893, referred to differences of opinion with regard to the war and said, "I have never loved him less, I have felt like honoring him more, for I can honor him more rather than less even if I differ from him in some matters profoundly,—for in the criticism and the loneliness of the man there comes forth his steadfastness, his loyalty."

Unity quotes its late editor's words: "When the wheels of life bear me down for the last time, I ask for no higher compliment, I seek no truer statement of the work I have tried to do than that which the white-headed old negress gave the beardless boy on the hot Corinth cornfield in 1862. Then, if I deserve it, let some one who loves me say, 'Here is a Linkum soldier who has done got run over,'—one who, like his leader, tried to pluck a thistle and plant a flower wherever a flower would grow."

TO THOSE I LOVE.

SHOULD I go west, I'd have you think of me

As one who loved his country; for the rest,

I would far rather that your life should be Completed to the full, should I go West.

Wear no black weeds, and shed no bitter tear;

Hide all your sorrow deep within your breast;

To fight the monstrous creed of Might and Fear

I'll gladly give my life—should I go West.

Bear this in mind: that whatso'er I can, I've tried to do with all my power—so best

Then what's amiss? If I have played the man,

'Tis up to you to smile—should I go West. CIVIS.

DR. WELLDON, recalling Gibbon's comment on the incident of the Sicilian Vespers—"I must remark that, even in this world, the natural order of events will sometimes afford the strong appearance of moral retribution"—points out how Germany's successive crimes have involved her in dangers that threaten her overwhelming defeat. The invasion of Belgium brought Great Britain into the war, the submarine outrages brought in the United States, the flouting of all international law has ranged the civilised world against her, and her "scrap of paper" tactics have so robbed her of all credit as to be the principal, if not the fatal, obstacle to any peace that will not involve her very existence as an Empire. It is truly a subject for all of us to ponder.

A CHAPLAINS' TRAINING SCHOOL, U.S.A.

We reported recently the entrance of our friend the Rev. H. E. B. Speight, formerly of Kensington, into a training School for Army Chaplains. He thinks the school, which is situated at Camp Taylor, Ky., is almost unique in character, and its aim is to improve on the old system of commissioning chaplains from civil life. The School selects from among candidates those men who may be expected to adapt themselves to military life, and gives them at the outset a practical knowledge of the ordinary soldier's life and the army regulations as to conduct. Candidates are rated as privates, go through military drill and exercises, and are personally subject as well as their bunks and barrack-rooms to daily and weekly inspections. The School in its present session, the fifth, has about 280 candidates in attendance, belonging to about a dozen different religious denominations. There are separate short meetings, for Catholics and Protestants respectively, before the whole School assembles, but this is the only dividing line amongst them. He says:—

"What this official endorsement of practical union and this friendly, even intimate, commingling of men who differ radically in conviction will mean to the nation after the war no one can as yet say, but the effect on the life of the churches and on their relation to the every-day problems of the laymen will be profound in character and without limit in scope."

SPECIAL WANTS.

Shirts and socks for men. (Very urgent as this week's demands have been very great and the store room is empty.) Woollen comforts, such as mufflers, cardigans, &c. Clothes for babies and young children.

Contributions of money and clothing should be sent to Mrs. Bernard Allen, 14, Gainsborough Gardens, Hampstead, N.W.3.

THREE hundred pounds is the handsome contribution of readers of THE INQUIRER towards meeting the cost of restoring and refitting the Y.M.C.A. buildings at the important centre where the Rev. W. H. Drummond is at work in France. We know he will cordially appreciate this response to his appeal. The exact total is £300 6s., including the following items sent since the closing of the list: Mr. E. Chitty, £5; Mr. J. E. Mace, 10s.; Mrs. Webb, U.S.A., £1; Miss C. Wells, £1; Omega, £1.

THE commemoration of the death of Sir Walter Raleigh will take place here and in America (at Raleigh, the capital of North Carolina) on October 29. At the latter place the life and services of Sir Walter Raleigh are to be made "the centre of a programme of Anglo-American relations." The programme which will be followed in this country includes a Memorial Service at St. Margaret's, Westminster, on Sunday afternoon, October 27, when the presence of Americans will be specially welcomed, and a public meeting at the Mansion House, when Mr. Balfour, Lord Bryce, General Sir Ian Hamilton, Mr. Edmund Gosse, C.B., and representatives of America are expected to speak.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Birmingham: Newhall Hill.—The Annual Meeting of the congregation was held in the church, Gibson Road, Handsworth, on October 14. The Treasurer's Report showed a substantial increase in the receipts for the past year, the members' subscriptions being 50 per cent more than in the preceding year. The Vestry Committee in their Report made eulogistic reference to the excellent progress made since the present minister, the Rev. Stanley Mossop, entered upon his duties in October, 1917; and the Reports on the work of the Sunday School and Guild which recorded growth in the membership were in every way encouraging. The increased activities within the church have rendered it essential that additional accommodation be provided, and the Building Fund Committee, which has been entrusted with the task of raising funds to erect permanent church buildings, announced that arrangements were being made for a Sale of Work to be held in December.

Bolton.—The Bolton Nonconformist Ministers' Association, at a meeting on Tuesday, Oct. 15, passed unanimously the following resolution: "That this Association records its regret that the Manchester Council of Christian Congregations has excluded the Unitarian churches from its fellowship, and expresses its confidence in the principle of comprehension, uniting the various denominations for social and Christian service."

Bournemouth.—The Sale of Work held on Wednesday, October 16, in the Church Hall, West Hill Road, was a gratifying success. It was opened at 3 o'clock by Mrs. Cogan Conway of Ringwood, President of the Southern Unitarian Association. The Rev. V. D. Davis, who presided, said that it was three years since they had made an effort of that kind in aid of the church funds, and in the interval the energies of the congregational Working Party had been devoted to the interests of Mrs. Bernard Allen's Belgian Hospital Fund. And even now, when they had felt it necessary again to work for the church, there was an opportunity of continuing that help. A box was placed in the hall to receive the goods of purchasers which might be so given, and the result was that there were parcels of useful garments to be sent both to Mrs. Bernard Allen for her Fund and to Mrs. Rogers at Portsmouth for the John Pounds Home. For the Church Funds the Sale produced a net result of over £60.

Brighton.—An Open Forum Movement has been initiated by the Rev. R. H. U. Bloor, to provide "a common meeting ground for all in the interest of truth and mutual understanding, for the cultivation of community of spirit, and the fullest and freest open public discussion of all vital questions affecting human welfare." The first meeting was held last Sunday afternoon, when Alderman C. Thomas Stanford, M.P., spoke on 'The Irish Question and a Federal Solution.'

Chatham.—A series of lectures on 'The Origins of Christianity' is being given on Monday evenings at the Unitarian Church by the Minister, the Rev. F. Cottier. A Study Circle has been formed at which the subjects of the lectures are dealt with, and the lectures themselves are followed by discussion. The attendances and the general nature of the discussions are a proof of the interest which this course has awakened. On Sunday, October 10, a special service was held in connection with the Sunday School, when the younger scholars took gifts of flowers up to the altar. Since Mr. Cottier's return from France, where he was for a period engaged in Y.M.C.A. work, the church has greatly benefited by the experiences which he gained during that time.

Devon Unitarian Ministers' Conference.—The Autumn Meeting was held on Monday, October 21, at Plymouth, on the invitation of the Treville Street Congregation. The Revs. F. Allen, J. W. Bishop, W. H. Burgess (pastor loci), Donald Fraser, C. E. Jewell, E. R. Hodges, and Sydney B. Street attended. At the afternoon session a paper was read by the Rev. Donald Fraser of Exeter on 'The Crisis in Christendom,' which was followed by a good discussion. Tea was served in the schoolroom by the ladies of the congregation. At the Public Meeting, over which Mr. Arthur Dufton, M.A., presided, the Rev. W. H. Burgess moved that affectionate greetings and thanks for their splendid services to the country be sent from the meeting to those who had gone from their church into the Army, Navy, and Air Force. Addresses were given by the visiting ministers. The Rev. Donald Fraser said the story had got about that Unitarians, while a very logical, correct, and reasonable people, were at the same time very cold. That was not his experience. He had been received with warmer cordiality during the few months he had been among the Unitarians than during the fifteen years of his previous ministry. It seemed to him that to be a Unitarian was to be a progressive not only in religious but in social and political matters. The Rev. Sydney Street, paraphrasing Mr. Lloyd George's classic phrase, said it was impossible to have "an A1 people with a C3 religion." It should be the aim of the nation therefore to keep before it the highest, purest, and noblest religious ideals. A welcome was given to the Rev. J. W. Bishop on his settlement in the province as minister at Cullompton and thanks were accorded to the Treville Street congregation for its hospitality.

Harvest Festival.—Harvest Thanksgiving Services have been held at Nottage, October 13 and 14 (preachers: the Rev. W. J. Phillips and the Rev. J. P. Southwell, Congregationalist); and at Wick (Glam.), October 13 and 15 (preachers: Mr. J. F. Ling and the Rev. W. J. Phillips). Blackfriars Mission and Stamford Street Chapel, September 28; Ilkeston, October 13 (preacher: the Rev. H. M. Long); Newton Abbott, October 13 (preacher: the Rev. Frederic Allen); Nantwich, October 20 (preachers: the Revs. B. J. Davies, Baptist, and the Rev. J. Park Davies).

Leeds: Holbeck.—At a Social Gathering held by the members of the Unitarian church and schools the Rev. W. R. Shanks was welcomed back to the ministry at Holbeck, which he gave up to go to Bradford in 1915. Mr. B. Pearson, who presided, recalled the fact that Mr. Shanks was formerly, for eleven years, an active leader in the church and school, and in the social life of the district, and he looked forward with every confidence to a renewal of their union. One of the best things Mr. Shanks had done amongst them had been revealed by the war. It was touching to see how, when the young men came home on leave from the front, they one and all wanted to renew their friendship with him. He had won their affection and confidence, and had greatly influenced them for good. The ladies of the congregation and the members of the Sunday school were looking forward, Mr. Pearson added, to having Mrs. Shanks and Miss Shanks among them again. Mr. J. Thomas, on behalf of the Sunday school, Dr. S. Moore, as one long connected with the church, Mr. W. B. Holgate, Secretary, the Rev. A. Leslie Smith, Mrs. Westerman, Miss Kitchen, and others also spoke, reference being made by some of the speakers to Mr. Shanks's useful work in connection with the Yorkshire Unitarian Union. Mr. and Mrs. Shanks both acknowledged the welcome which had been given to them.

Mansfield.—The Rev. T. P. Spedding, now Minister of the Old Meeting House, and Mrs. Spedding were cordially welcomed by the congregation at a largely attended meeting on October 14. Mr. J. Harrop White presided, and among those supporting him were the Revs. Kenneth Bond (representing the ministers of the North Midland Association), W. H. Proudlove (United Methodist), A. Briggs (Congregational), W. Whiteley (Baptist), C. M. Wright, and Charles Peach. Letters regretting inability to attend were received from Prof. Carpenter, the Rev. C. F. Gill, Adjutant Handley and Mrs. Adlington. The Chairman, after expressing his pleasure at seeing so many people gathered together to greet Mr. and Mrs. Spedding and their son, read the resolution which had been passed by the British and Foreign Unitarian Association with reference to his valuable work in connection with the Van Mission, and Home Camps visitation, which was printed in our columns last week. Mr. Spedding had a large field before him, first in his own congregation, and secondly in the town in conjunction with his brother ministers. Never was there a greater call to the churches and Sunday school than to-day. They must throw aside all that might hinder the reunion of the churches, concentrate upon those points on which they agreed, and work for the bringing of this country nearer to what it ought to be. Mr Birks offered a welcome to Mr. and Mrs. Spedding on behalf of the congregation, and Mr. Knappe (Secretary) spoke for the Sunday school. Other speakers were the Revs W. H. Proudlove, A. Briggs, and W. Whiteley, who offered a welcome to Mr. Spedding on behalf of their respective communions; C. M. Wright, Kenneth Bond, and Charles Peach. In his reply Mr. Spedding emphasised the importance of Sunday school work. The most important branch of social reform, he said, lay amongst the young. He did not regret that he had come "off the road," and after travelling about the country for years he thought when the kindly invitation came to him from Mansfield he could enter upon a more settled life.

Northampton.—The Autumn Conference of members of Kettering Road Church was held on Friday, October 17. The chair was taken by the Rev. W. C. Hall, who, after pointing out the utility of periodical conference by the members, reviewed the work of the church and its institutions during the past six months, and drew attention to their immediate requirements. The winter work, necessarily limited under war conditions, had again started well; the reopening meetings of the various societies had been very encouraging. He was glad that a liturgical form of service prepared by him at the request of the Committee had been favourably received, but further experimental use of it would be made before putting the question of its adoption before the congregation. Mr. H. Roberts, Treasurer, reported that the income of the church for the past nine months was nearly equal to that of the preceding twelve months. There had been an appreciable increase in the offertory.—Mr. Hall is delivering, from time to time, morning discourses on 'Great Religious Poems,' and during the present month a series of evening sermons on 'The New Acceptance of Jesus.'

North Cheshire Sunday School Union.—The 55th Annual Meeting of the Union was held at Wilton Street School, Denton, on Saturday, October 19, and was attended by sixty delegates and teachers. The Rev. H. E. Perry presided at a committee meeting in the afternoon, and at a business meeting after tea, in the absence of the President on business, and the Vice-President, on service in France. The 32nd Annual Report, which was presented by Mr. Slater, mentioned that more than 1,056 names were on the Rolls of Honour of the 14 schools of the Union, and that no less than 104 had made the great sacrifice. The statistics showed that the schools were keeping up in numbers, the adult scholars having increased by 95. The report and financial statement were adopted and the officers re-elected. At the conclusion of the formal business, the Rev. Lawrence Scott read a thoughtful and suggestive paper on 'Some Sunday School Problems that are Meeting Us.' Owing to want of time, no formal discussion followed, but subsequent speakers briefly referred to various points raised in the paper. The singing class gave several part-songs under the leadership of Mr. E. Whitehead. Votes of thanks were accorded to Mr. Scott and to the Chairman and the Denton friends.

Oldham.—A Jumble Sale, organised by the local branch of the Women's League, was held in the Unitarian schoolroom on Tuesday, October 22. It was opened by Mrs. Robson, and in a remarkably short time the tables were practically cleared. The proceeds, which will go to the chapel funds, amounted to over £30.

Warwick.—The notice board of High Street Chapel will in future bear the inscription: "Associated with the Unitarian Movement, which is pledged to promote Faith, Freedom, and Fellowship." The Rev. S. T. Pagesmith is the minister.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

All letters and manuscripts for the Editor should be sent to 13 Bream's Buildings, Fetter Lane, London, E.C.4. They must reach the Editor not later than Wednesday morning for publication the same week.

ON Tuesday the Archbishop of Canterbury presided at Lambeth Palace over a conference of between 40 and 50 representatives of Christian Churches in the United Kingdom, including Unitarians, to discuss methods of supporting the project of a League of Nations. The following resolutions were carried unanimously:—

"I. That this Conference of representatives of the British Churches desires the Archbishop of Canterbury to represent to the Government the strong conviction they have that steps should be taken without delay to draft a project for a League of Nations, and to beg that the Government will take the requisite steps in union with the Allied Governments to secure this end.

"II. That this Conference, being unanimously convinced that the formation of a League of Nations is essential to the establishment of such international relations as may prevent the recurrence of war, and recognising that it is the duty of the Christian Churches to do all in their power to secure this great object, appoints a committee (1) to draw up a public declaration in support of a League of Nations, to be signed by the responsible heads of the Christian Churches; (2) to arrange, if found desirable, a national conference; and (3) to take the requisite steps to further educational propaganda throughout the country, and if possible beyond it, in such concert with others as may seem advisable."

COLONEL JOHN WARD, M.P., C.M.G., who was on his way to China with his battalion when the memorable episode took place connected with the mining of the troopship 'Tyndareus' off the Cape early last year, has been in the East since that time, and recently moved with his troops to Vladivostock and beyond. The Times understands that he was the commanding officer who by decisive action effectually saved a dangerous situation in Siberia. The first detachment of his battalion having arrived at Zema the engine-driver was held up by armed Bolsheviks, who threatened violence if he did not join a strike. The plan was to prevent the westward transport of Allied troops, and if successful would have been disastrous to our cause. Colonel Ward, we hear, marched his men into the town promptly, arrested the leader, ordered the rest of the strikers back on pain of court-martial and thus quelled the movement, setting his force free from dangers in front and rear. Our contemporary states that in addition to the 'Tyndareus' incident, Colonel Ward had previously distinguished himself by service in France, but we believe this to be a mistake. He was instrumental in raising a large body of pioneer troops for the front, but did not leave this country till he sailed for the East. Our gallant and stalwart friend has no need of imagined exploits to win our plaudits.

THE local Society of Friends have withdrawn from the Manchester and Salford Council of Christian Congregations, for reasons set forth by their chairman in a letter which contains the following passages: "We are earnestly desirous to promote co-operation and real unity among the churches, but we think it a false step to draw in the 'orthodox' churches only, excluding such bodies as the Unitarians or the Swedenborgians. We realise that such a course may, for the present, bring the larger number within your fold. Nevertheless, we believe that the only Holy Catholic Church is composed of all faithful souls who enter into the same religious experience under varying forms of thought. Prayer, consecration, redemption from the power of sin, and the felt presence of God are the experiences out of which have grown the systems of doctrine which seek to explain them.

These systems will endlessly vary with man's varying knowledge and power of thought. So that it is in experience rather than in doctrine that Christians find themselves one. We believe that we shall best serve the cause of Christian unity in the long run by hereby withdrawing, with real personal regret, from your Council. We hope the withdrawal will not be permanent, and that a wider fellowship may shortly be realised." We regret that "Artifex" of The Manchester Guardian defends the action of the exclusive majority.

THAT women may look forward to becoming members of parliament is recognised as the logical consequence of the enfranchisement of their sex. The experience of other lands where this right obtains does not carry us very far in trying to forecast the results of a step which, by an overwhelming majority, has been approved in the House of Commons. Probably our own experience in municipal and other forms of local government indicates sufficiently the nature and degree of the political influence of women, now that they are to share the conflicts of candidature and the legislative debate. A few of them will, perhaps, enter the House, and if they bring to bear upon its business the acute intellect and discernment that we have seen in other circles of public life, undoubtedly they will be a welcome accession to the nation's councils. Some of them, we confess, who have recently attained notoriety, show less hopeful promise; but are all the men who get elected alike wise, discreet, patriotic, and diligent?

LIEUT.-COL. C. SEYMOUR BULLOCK was the preacher for the evening service in the City Temple on Sunday, and during his sermon on 'Dreams and Visions' he pictured England as it was before August, 1914, and as it will be (?) a few years hence—"An England where man is rated by his worth and not by his birth; an England with a live Church addressing itself to the affairs of time while conscious of eternity; an England without slums; an England without a public-house." When he pictured the home of the man ruined by the public-house and declared that no nation ever grew strong through the vices of its people, and said: "I plead for the helpless, for the woman from whose cheeks the roses have faded, for the babes from whom the smiles were stolen as they lay sleeping in their cradles, for the boys and the girls cursed into poverty by the public-house on the corner. Oh! how I hate that hellish thing! But its days are numbered!" the congregation broke into enthusiastic applause. One of the oldest attendants said of the sermon: "It was the most powerfully dramatic thing since the early days of Joseph Parker."

CHIEF JUSTICE SIR ROBERT STOUT delivering a lecture recently in the Unitarian Free Church, Wellington, New Zealand, on the subject of 'Prisons and Prisoners' gave some encouraging details showing the improvements effected in prison management in the Colony, and suggestive of large possibilities in the home country. "Many prisoners," said Sir Robert, "are being trained to an industrial life. Many are having a neglected education improved. They are free from any temptation, they are living a healthy life, and their wills are being disciplined. In one or two of the gaols they are not denied what may be termed pleasures and amusements." In his opinion homes should be established for chronic offenders, who should be under indeterminate sentences. Prisoners should be made to feel that the State cares for them and desires them to become good citizens. He would make all gaols open-air places of work, believing that sun and air would prove truly remedial. In his view "alcohol is a poisonous drug that weakens the will of men and women and leads directly to crime. At least one-third of our crime can be attributed to alcohol.Indirectly, perhaps, it has even a greater effect in the causation of crime."

ONE of the incidents in the crowded programme of the Autumnal Meetings of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association at Manchester was the photographing of a large group of ministers and delegates for the purpose of inclusion in the next Lawrence House Bulletin. Last year's group proved greatly interesting to our soldiers—of whom we hear there are now more than 8,000 whose names are known at Essex Hall. We would remind our readers that more money is needed for printing and sending out this messenger of our affection and good wishes to the men, and it will greatly help all concerned if donations are sent in promptly. Mr. Ronald Jones, it will be noticed, has had to make good his proffer of £5 each for the occupation by the Allied troops of two more of the ten places named by him, and now we watch to see which of the remaining four will fall into our possession first—Brussels, Metz, Constantinople, or Trieste. The fact is that the men are doing their part so well that the rest of the money required ought to come rolling in.

THE BELGIAN FUND.

OUR Fund in aid of Belgian soldiers and civilians has been in existence considerably over three years and a half, as may be seen from the fact that the present week's list of donations is the 192nd. It is the only one that has survived of various funds which sprang into being under the impulse of that great wave of generous sympathy which was called forth by the terrible sufferings of this brave little nation in the first months of the war. While other efforts have languished and ceased ours, we are proud to say, has been maintained and extended. The money contributed to date is over £21,400, and the value of gifts in kind is estimated as fully equal to that sum. Thus, we may say the readers of THE INQUIRER have devoted to this purpose considerably over £40,000.

Let us recall what has been done with the money—the great comfort and succour afforded by the other gifts must be left to imagination. Here are some, by no means all, of the beneficial items: Surgical instruments, beds, furniture, drugs, clothing, and comforts have been given, regularly or at intervals, to 137 Military Hospitals and Convalescent Depots. Over 500 doctors at the front have been aided with surgical outfits or refits. The Hospice Belge, which afterwards became the Maternité Belge, at Calais has been and is wholly maintained by the Fund. In addition a Hospice at Waton was maintained for six months in 1915. Aid has been given to more than 30 Colonies Scolaires, for orphans, and complete equipment for a children's hospital. Many canteens have been supplied with books and games; 20,000 francs was expended on the Hut at Calais, and 8,000 on tents at the front. At Chambéry an excellent water supply has been provided at the cost of 20,000 francs, and a steam laundry furnished for another hospital, costing 10,000 francs. In addition 7 motor-cars and ambulances have been sent out in connection with these and other works of aid.

Piles of letters full of grateful appreciation have been received alike from those relieved and from the agents of relief. These we must leave unquoted here, but one letter at least shall be given as indicating through the head of the Belgian State a sense of widespread gratitude. The Minister of War wrote as follows to Mrs. Bernard Allen: "J'ai l'honneur de porter à votre connaissance que S.M. le Roi, voulant reconnaître les éminents services que vous avez rendus à l'Armée Belge, vient de vous décerner la Croix de Chevalier de l'Ordre de Léopold. Je suis heureux de saisir cette occasion pour joindre à ce témoignage de haute bienveillance de Notre Souverain, l'expression de mes sentiments reconnaissants pour votre sollicitude constante et votre générosité sans bornes, à l'égard de nos pauvres blessés ou malades." The Queen of the Belgians had already conferred a decoration on Mrs. Allen, and not only is the double distinction a remarkable testimony to the invaluable services rendered by the Fund in Mrs. Allen's management, but the conferring on a woman of the Croix de Chevalier de l'Ordre de Léopold is, we believe, unprecedented. The Imperial War Museum at Whitechapel has fitly accorded prominence to the insignia thus bestowed on our friend, whose administrative ability—unlike that of a good many philanthropical persons—is as undeniable as her benevolence.

Our recital of these facts must not be taken as anything like a closing of the story. The truth is that with the liberation of so much Belgian territory an enormous addition has been made to the area of distress now appealing for relief. The fighting in which the Belgian soldiers have recently taken so distinguished a part has inevitably largely increased the number of wounded. Obviously the needs are as urgent to-day as ever in the past, and with winter coming on the outlook is a most anxious one. Many of our generous helpers have been so constant that we do not doubt their readiness to respond to this renewed appeal. But what we should very much like to see would be the introduction of new names on our lists, not only of donors of money but also of groups of workers. In respect of this noble charity considerations apply similar to those affecting many other kinds of war work. We hope eagerly for a speedy cessation of hostilities, but even if it comes, and even if a settled peace follows without protracted delay, the needs to be relieved will still confront us for a long while. Let us therefore gird ourselves in this as elsewhere for unflagging endeavours until we can with some measure of satisfaction accept release.

As we have said, we publish this week the 192nd list. The 200th will coincide with Christmas week; we suggest that special efforts should be made to make that list as full and generous as possible, and by way of getting into stride the weeks that intervene will serve for kindly exercise in the fine art of giving. May we beg all who sympathise with these aims to introduce the subject in their respective circles?

ATTENTION is directed to the Queen's Hall Meeting, fixed for 7.30 on Wednesday, to urge the withdrawal of Regulation 40 D, D.O.R.A.

DR. COURTNEY S. KENNY, who has just resigned his chair as Downing Professor of the Laws of England at Cambridge University, is known to some of our readers as one whose broad and generous sympathies in religion match his ripe learning. In addition to numerous academical honours and appointments he has been Vice-Chairman of the Cambridge County Council and for a short time represented the Barnsley Division in Parliament. A familiar visitor to Essex Hall, he has long taken keen interest in the diffusion of Unitarian literature, and many ministers, not knowing the source, have benefited by this form of his benevolence.

MR. DRINKWATER's new drama, 'Abraham Lincoln,' which has been produced at the Birmingham Repertory Theatre, has come at a singularly opportune moment. It is said to be somewhat akin to the chronicle-history play in style, while the portrait of Lincoln, which is historically accurate, "has the complete and expressive beauty of artistic creation." We hope we shall have an opportunity of seeing it in London.

THE BRITISH AND FOREIGN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

THE Autumnal Meetings were held on October 26-28 at Gorton, Manchester, delegates being present from the Women's League, the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and the Sunday School Association.

Gorton is on the outskirts of the city; to reach it you have to go through miles and miles of dingy cottage-property and tram-lined streets, the outstanding features of which are a theatre, Belle Vue, the parsonage, and the chapel keeper's mansion. Standing out like an oasis in the desert of bricks and mortar is Brookfield Church, the home of Unitarianism in the district. Founded over two hundred years ago, the church has been rebuilt and is famous amongst our churches for its ecclesiastical style—heavy polished marble pillars, nave, and choir, stained windows, noisy door-latch (the last a terror to late-comers), and its peal of bells. Standing in two or three acres of ground, half used as a burial-ground, there are separate, commodious, and well-appointed school buildings, offering everything that can be desired in the way of attractiveness and accommodation. The Rev. Albert Thornhill and his band of workers are envied by many who have to carry on with more primitive premises and small hopes of improvement.

Let us say at once that the local arrangements were carried out with splendid enthusiasm. Manchester folk are hospitable to the core; everything that could help to make the visitors comfortable was there, even to the famous plum cake—how they had managed it they did not tell us—without which no Tea is complete. The local secretaries did not come out into the limelight: the way they had done their work was evidenced by Mr. Bowie, who said that he, as Secretary of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, had found nothing to do but enjoy the meetings. And the meetings were good. In normal times they would have been very fair: under present conditions the attendances were excellent, and (in spite of the seeming pessimism of some speakers) augurs well for the liberal religious movement in Lancashire.

There are, however, two criticisms that must be made. It may be that the acoustic properties of Brookfield Church are not of the best. As we listened to the speakers we suspected that it was so. But the elocution of most of the speakers was deplorable. We had been under the impression that the general level of elocution in our churches was high. Alas! our belief in ourselves is shattered. Half the speakers were unable, or did not trouble, to make themselves heard at the back of the church: they were ignorant of the rudiments of public speaking, and not least among the offenders were some who are supposed to be taking a leading place in the denomination. The matter may have been excellent: the delivery certainly was not. The art of public speaking may be of insignificant value in the training of ministers compared to the study of Hebrew or philosophy, but we are not surprised at the "indifference of the masses" after what we failed to hear at the meetings. Our second criticism is levelled at the arrangement of the programme—it was too crowded. Part of the value of such meetings is the opportunity for the renewal of old friendships and for short informal conferences on matters relating to the work of the two Associations and the League. These conferences were almost impossible without absence from some or other of the meetings. Even the Social on the Saturday evening was crowded with speeches, which were duplicated at Monday's luncheon. If the programme is less strenuous, the meetings will be more valuable. Verb. sap.

SUNDAY SCHOOL TEACHERS.

And now to the meetings. Saturday afternoon and Monday morning opened with a devotional service, conducted respectively by the Revs. J. H. Ewbank of Swinton and the Rev. G. Randall Jones of Pendleton. The Saturday afternoon session was devoted to Sunday School work, the Rev. C. M. Wright (Liverpool) reading an excellent paper on 'The More Efficient Religious Training of Prospective Sunday School Teachers,' followed by a discussion, in which Mr. F. W. Monks, the Revs. D. W. Robson, A. Thornhill, J. Shaw Brown, amongst others, took part. The topic was suggested by Gorton and the emphasis was on the word "religious." There is a difference between religious training and training in religion, and while the latter is comparatively easy, the former is most difficult. And though the discussion frequently side-tracked on to other points of teacher-training, which certainly needed emphasis, more than one speaker insisted that the religious training of teachers was a subjective matter in which personality played a large part. After all, religion cannot be put on and off by some second person: the most a second person may do is to show the way; religious training must depend on the individual, and the best teacher is he who has the best character. You cannot teach religion unless you yourself are religious.

On Sunday members of the deputations conducted the services and visited the schools at neighbouring churches, and from each encouraging reports are to hand of good attendances and inspiring addresses. Manchester is getting into the very bad habit of being sorry for itself: a sure way to stagnation. The sooner it realises that the prospects are not hopeless the better for itself. If Sunday's services are anything to go by, it should be looking forward to as bright a future as it has had a past. But here, also, we gather, a good Unitarian is one who subscribes that a church may be kept open for other people—very good so far as it goes, but much more likely to be effective if he himself went too. Vicarious suffering is all very well in its way, but our forefathers were made of sterner stuff. By way of contrast, we noted that at Bradford (Manchester), thirty new members were welcomed into the fellowship of the church at a special service by the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie.

CONFERENCE.

On Monday the meetings lasted for eleven hours! The Rev. A. T. Thornhill (Gorton) read a paper on 'The Threatened Eclipse of Religion.' It was high time, he said, that careful thought should be given to the changing attitude of great multitudes of people towards the Church as at present organised. It was evident in the lowered vitality of the churches themselves, and was not entirely due, as had been said, to war conditions. Multitudes thronged places of amusement, sometimes three times a day, and picture-houses had sprung up almost like mushrooms in a night. For good or evil, they were going to become a potent influence in the lives of the people. The children constituted the key to the position, and the question people had to ask themselves was, were they going to let the children go without a fight? It was no wonder the Master had little hold upon them while Charlie Chaplin held them in the hollow of his hand. There was an inability on the part of the Church to touch the heart of the nation, and they might ask why it had ceased to be aggressive and had allowed itself to be manœuvred into a defensive attitude. Whatever the explanation, the Church, which ought to be a fount of inspiration, revivifying humanity, was in danger of becoming a stagnant pool, which even sorrowing souls often preferred to pass by. The present condition of things was the fruition of the long-standing malady of materialism, which had been spreading for sixty years or more, and had now become epidemic.

The Rev. W. Whitaker read a paper on 'The Recrudescence of the Belief in Miracles.' He said it is not only the unthinking and ignorant who seem to find the basis of their faith in supernatural interferences with nature. The explanation is to be found partly in the startling revelations of recent science, which make men feel that nothing is too wonderful to happen. Also, a clear discrimination is now generally recognised between natural science, properly so called, and the discredited materialistic interpretation of science. The attack upon miracles has usually been made in the name of the latter. Just in proportion, therefore, as men consciously throw off materialistic conceptions, they come to have an open mind on the question of miracle. One aspect, in particular, of that exploded interpretation of nature, has proved a broken reed for liberal religion to rest upon. It is the notion that all events must happen according to certain rigid lines of procedure, in obedience to the impulsion of exact quantities of force. This is the "reign of law," under which miracles, if they could happen, would be a breach of a fixed order. This reasoning is seen to be futile when we realise that the only laws which could be invariable and absolute would be mathematical laws. In so far as the whole of existence could be reduced to exact quantities of matter impelled by exact quantities of force, to that extent we could see the universe moving like clockwork, precise, punctual, and with infallible mechanical actions. Needless to say, there is scarcely any part of the universe to which we can apply the idea of such strict laws. Moreover, even if we did discover any such part, still we could not make an infallible law of it so as to enable us to predict that the same thing would always happen; for the same set of circumstances and conditions is never repeated. There is a wildness and roughness about Nature that does not suit with the smoothness of our scientific generalisations. As Prof. J. H. Poynting has said, physical laws have greatly fallen off in dignity of late. Of course he does not mean to deny that there are similarities and regularities. But the nearer these approach to the possibility of being precisely measured, the further they are away from the processes of life and mind. Our "natural laws" can never describe absolute uniformities.

Has liberal religion, then, fallen upon evil days in thus losing the support of certain popular conceptions of science in its protest against the miraculous? On the contrary, it is the great opportunity for liberal religion to express its real soul, for it is now thrown solely upon its own conception of God. Religious men have hitherto refused to be convinced by our rationalist argument, for they felt it was not in itself a religious argument, and the only thing that can convince such men is an argument drawn from our own knowledge of God. We have to show that our teaching about God is in accordance with the real facts of the world as men know it, not with a world of illusion. The latter is bound up with ideas of an unreal transcendence of God. But on the other hand liberal religion has often lost sight of the real transcendence. It has flattened out the idea of God by identifying Him with all things in general, so as to fail to see Him specially in any particular thing. It has practically done away with the idea of explicit and definite revelation. It has been afraid of the unique. Religion commits suicide when it thus denies transcendence. God is higher than our thought, although He is not (as miracle would indicate) contrary to our thought.

Liberal religion must learn how to express this transcendence. If we give up miracle, we must have in ourselves the equivalent of miracle. We must experience the wonder-working power that makes all things new.

THE YOUNG PEOPLE.

After lunch and more speeches the visitors were photographed, and before we had time to recover, we were again shepherded into the church to listen to addresses by the Revs. W. Copeland Bowie and W. G. Tarrant on the 'Work of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association.' This was followed immediately by a conference on 'What have Unitarians to Offer our Young Men and Women concerning Life and Religion?' introduced by the Revs. A. Hall (Sheffield) and J. C. Flower (Bolton), followed by Miss A. E. Clephan (Leicester). Mr. Hall's paper will be given in our next issue. Glances forward and glances backward were indulged in by all the speakers: would it be that the returning men would teach us instead of vice versa? What had attracted us in our youth to Unitarianism? Yet there were some things that would always stand out: it was a movement in which all were offered a partnership on equal terms; it was simple and satisfying; it insisted on the divinity of the individual and the sacredness of truth and freedom—priceless things to the questing soul. This was, perhaps, one of the best of the conferences, and encouraging to those engaged in the practical work who are apt, at times, to doubt the worth of what they have to offer.

PUBLIC MEETING.

After tea, an organ recital. Then the Public Meeting, presided over by Mr. Leigh Worthington. The chairman referred to the recent boycott of the Unitarians by the Manchester Council of Christian Congregations, which had refused to admit into their fellowship representatives of the Pendleton and Platt congregations, and proposed a resolution of protest which was carried unanimously. The subject for the evening was 'The Unitarian Contribution to the Religious Thought and Life of the World,' each speaker dealing in his own way with the contribution as it most appealed to him. Mr. Worthington emphasised the freedom of conscience and the insistence on character as two of the contributions and pointed to the ideal of fellowship which is found throughout the denomination. In spite of the boycott he looked forward to the drawing together of all sects in one united Church.

The President of the Association (Mr. Richard Holt, M.P.) was the first of the four speakers. Without suggesting that no other denomination had contributed the same thing, nor that the points to be referred to by the speakers were all that had been contributed by Unitarians, what, he asked, did we think we were doing by maintaining the denomination. Referring to the Open Trust, he said that no matter what the origin of the openness might be—and there seemed to be some doubt about it—it meant now what it was supposed to mean. Unitarianism insisted that truth is a matter of progressive revelation. No other Church was as free as theirs. After glancing at the ideals that were in the minds of the Ejected of 1662, Mr. Holt concluded by saying that difference of opinion among men in matters theological was not improper, but what was necessary was that there should be unity of spirit, that men might work together for the establishment of the kingdom of God on earth.

The Rev. Alfred Hall, who followed, said that Unitarianism was a movement that had stood especially for veracity. Its adherents were intellectually sensitive, and it was a privilege, a moral and intellectual strengthening, to have been brought up in a Unitarian home, for it made a difference to our worship and our reverence if we had a right conception of God. It stood for the readiness to accept new truth as it was revealed to man. It had developed the emphasis in the New Testament testimony of Christ. It insisted on the unity of God, of human nature, of mankind, of the individual. It had made others think in the right direction. Not doctrine but method was important, and Unitarianism had introduced to the world a new method.

In the opinion of the third speaker, Mr. C. Sydney Jones, the main contribution to the religious life and thought of the world lay in the freedom on which Unitarians insist to worship God as He reveals Himself to us; in the insistence on honesty of belief—there must be no quibbling, as so often seemed to be the case in other churches, notably in the Henson controversy—and, with freedom of thought, in the necessity to tolerate the views of others. But while the contribution in the past had been great, what was to be the contribution in the future? Will the changed man find the churches changed? Can we show to men a real live religion? Our spiritual ancestors believed in their religion so earnestly that they were willing to give up everything—home, prospects, even life itself; how much do we believe? As much? If the contribution of the future is to equal that of the past, the churches must become filled with new life.

The Rev W. G. Tarrant spoke of the work done by Unitarianism here and in America. That country and this would have been much poorer had it not been for the members of our household of faith—a host of which we might well be proud. For instance, Dr. Drummond. While it was true that the emphasis was laid on truth and freedom, that was not all: it had shown that we need not be afraid of truth and that we might rejoice in freedom.

Five great speeches. Alone they would have been sufficient excuse for the meetings. Running through each was a deep note of spiritual earnestness, and no denomination which can produce laymen and ministers of that calibre need be pessimistic concerning its future. They finished as they had begun and continued; it was good to be there. Altogether a happy and inspiring week-end.

LAWRENCE HOUSE.

NATIONAL CONFERENCE.

THE Committee met on October 24 at Dr. Williams's Library, London, seventeen members being present: apologies were received from a large number who were unable to attend. Mr. Hugh Rathbone was unanimously requested to serve as President, in the place of the Rev. Dr. Hargrove, deceased, till the next Triennial Conference. A resolution of deep regret and sympathy in regard to the death of the late President was adopted. A message of sympathy was also directed to be sent to the Rev. J. Harwood, secretary, who was absent owing to serious illness. The Treasurer in presenting his report intimated that, in consequence of insuperable circumstances, he would be obliged to resign office at the next Conference. Reports were presented by the Committee on the Supply of Ministers and for assisting Ministers in the education of their children. Representatives were appointed to the Joint Committee for Revising the List of Ministers. It was decided to commend to the churches the general collection for the Red Cross and St. John's Ambulance Societies at or about the New Year. An appeal presented in person by the Rev. C. Peach on behalf of the Florence Nightingale Home, Great Hucklow, and supported by several members, was referred to a special committee for consideration and report. The question of the date of the next Conference was postponed, and the date of the next meeting of the Committee was left to be fixed by the officers.

MINISTERS' PENSIONS AND INSURANCE FUND.

A MEETING of the Board of Managers was held on Wednesday, 23rd ult. Policies were re-assigned to one beneficiary who had withdrawn from the denomination, and to another who had ceased to be a minister. The death of two beneficiaries was announced: in one case the single premium paid, £22 2s. 6d., was returned to the estate; in the other an insurance of £274 18s. was paid. Special facilities were to be offered to ministers who had insured for pension only, so as to secure the return to their estate, in case of death before pension age, of all premiums paid in. Five new applications for Children's Educational Endowment Assurance were accepted. The Board, anxious to utilise the Philip Holt Fund as far as possible for this purpose, resolved to increase to £20 the maximum annual contribution towards premiums in the case of beneficiaries who insure themselves for pension and one or more of their children for Education. Additional tables of Educational Insurance were adopted, making provision for assistance from ages 10 to 18, 12 to 18, and 18 to 23. These tables will be printed and issued to ministers in due course.

THE Rev. J. W. Maw, Secretary of the Yorkshire Unitarian Sunday School Union, writes from Heathcote, Moorlands Avenue N., Dewsbury, as follows: "I am anxious to obtain a complete set of the Annual Reports of the Yorkshire Unitarian Sunday School Union from the date of its inception in 1867 down to the present time, with a view to the same being bound together in book form and kept as a permanent record. I should be greatly obliged if any of your readers who have such copies would send them on to me."

STONEHENGE was formally handed over to the nation last week, and accepted on behalf of the Government by Sir Alfred Mond. Thirty acres of additional ground accompany the gift, and it is hoped that not only will the surroundings be improved, but that it will be possible to extend the excavations which have already been made on the site.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THANKS.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—I should like, with your permission, to send a word of hearty thanks to all who have contributed to the fund for the most necessary renovation of our premises at this place. Though peace-talk is in the air our business is to go on with our work, and to provide all the help and comfort for our men which it is possible to do under the difficult conditions of camp life. Even in the event of Germany admitting defeat and accepting the severe terms which must be imposed upon her in the near future, most of us will have to be here for many months during the Peace Conference and the period of demobilisation. We shall be able to work more efficiently and to make better provision for the needs of the men owing to the generous help of many readers of THE INQUIRER. It is of most urgent importance that there should be no slackening of effort in any direction, and no shortage of workers and of help of every possible kind, as long as the flower of our manhood, the nation of the future, is still on foreign service.—

Yours, &c., WM. H. DRUMMOND.

MONTHLY NOTES.

THE glorious offensive of the last few weeks has left a sad trail of wounded men behind it. The Belgian hospitals in Belgium and France are crowded out though beds have been added wherever possible. The matron of one of the largest hospitals with 2,000 beds writes: "We want roller bandages and dressings, as we are getting through such an enormous amount. What we want most beside for the comfort of the men are small pillows and cushions for under limbs, and we are quite out of face washers, and slings, slippers and pyjamas. I really hardly know how we get through the days—we are so few to tackle such numbers. We are all doing dressings from morning till night and it is dreadful feeling one can do so little for them, and they are so good and plucky and so cheery. You would not recognise the hospital. It has quite ceased to be for convalescents and after treatment and is more like a casualty clearing station. We are so dreadfully in want of little extras to give to the ones who are very weak and not fit for full diet. If you could send me some Bovril, Benger's Food, &c., I should be so glad."

I have already sent off some of the things wanted, but I have no pyjamas, slippers, face washers or slings or small pillows, and I should be grateful if friends would send some in. My store room has been completely cleared out, as, for the first time since 1914, convoys of wounded Belgians have been arriving in London at the two Belgian hospitals all this week. As the hospitals here were not equipped for this rush of wounded there has been a great deal to do to get them ready. I watched English W.D. lorries delivering beds and mattresses at one of the hospitals and there was literally nowhere to put them! A house had been hired close by but it would only hold about half the 250 men expected. Still they would get settled down somehow before the convoy arrived.

In spite of everything, everybody is so happy. The head of an orphanage writes: "Our children are crazy with joy: every evening after supper they have dancing and singing to celebrate the daily triumphs of our armies. We shall not, however, be able to return to our dear country yet. Our part of the country is one vast desert and it will be some time before it will be inhabitable and accessible for us civilians. In our town there is not one house which can be repaired and all the surrounding country is a mass of shell holes full of water."

I hope friends will not too optimistically conclude that our work is over. On the contrary it will be more arduous than ever for the next few months, but I am full of hope that we are now within sight of the end.

NOTES ON SOME RECENT BOOKS.

Alberti (Mario), Corsi (Carlo), General, Sillani (Tomaso), and others. ITALY'S GREAT WAR AND HER NATIONAL ASPIRATIONS; introd. by H. Nelson Gay. 267 pp.

The curse of Austrian domination in Italy down to 1866 is fully described in the introductory chapter to this useful little volume—which is well illustrated and contains some excellent maps—and it explains why the German horrors in Belgium created such a deep impression in Italy in 1914. They recalled that nation's own martyrdom under the Teuton. The various chapters deal with Italy's national aspirations and the causes which have created them, the sufferings of the Italians in the unredeemed provinces, and the part which Italy has played in the great war.

Angell (Norman). THE POLITICAL CONDITIONS OF ALLIED SUCCESS. G. P. Putnam's Sons. 350 pp., 7s. 6d. n.

In this practical study of the conditions of survival for the democratic States, which is really "a plea for the protective union of the democracies," Mr. Angell writes with all the incisiveness and directness which we have become familiar with in his previous books. As he says, "the times are too serious for looking upon our politics either as entertainment, or as the means whereby we may feed our emotions" and he makes use of his intimate knowledge of English and American aims and methods to drive home the chief lessons to be learnt from the war.

Dubash (P. S. G.). THE ROMANCE OF SOULS. Luzac & Co. 157 pp.

Mr. Dubash has made a brave venture in writing his "philosophic romance in verse" in English. It deals with ancient civilisations and reincarnation.

Hetherington (H. J. W.), M.A., and Muirhead (J. H.), LL.D. SOCIAL PURPOSE: A CONTRIBUTION TO A PHILOSOPHY OF CIVIC SOCIETY. London, Allen & Unwin. 317 pp., 10s. 6d. n.

It is a very illuminating fact that the things of the spirit in their relation to the daily life of man are being re-asserted, explained, and emphasised by many writers on social and political subjects at the present time. "Henceforth," say the authors of this particular book, "civic organisation must bear a new significance," and it will be based on "the spirit of art, science, and religion, themselves one," which is "also one with the spirit of love." The Church and State, they claim, "owe their origin to the same spiritual impulse," and they have the privilege of co-operating for the same high ends. The volume is full of stimulating ideas, but it should at the same time counteract healthily much modern philosophising about personality, the family, and individual responsibility, for instance, which needs to be somewhat toned down for general edification.

Hobhouse (Prof. T. L.), D.Litt. THE METAPHYSICAL THEORY OF THE STATE; with appendixes. London, Allen & Unwin. 156 pp., 7s. 6d. n.

The vastness of the ideal here set forth might well, as Professor Hobhouse himself points out, invite the accusation of vagueness, were it not that "it starts with the simple relations of man and man," and builds up the whole fabric of the State on "our duty towards our neighbour." The substance of the volume was given in a course of lectures at the London School of Economics in the autumn of 1917. Its acute reasoning throws much light on the processes by which men come to translate their individual will into the will of the community.

Quiller-Couch (Sir Arthur). SHAKESPEARE'S WORKMANSHIP. Fisher Unwin. 368 pp., index, 15s. n.

Consists of matter originally given as lectures at Cambridge University. Is thoroughly enjoyable from first to last, and under the author's vivacity is hidden a great deal of shrewd observation and solid study. He gives us the benefit of his expert knowledge and insight, is not afraid of the commentators nor even of Shakespeare himself; but with all his criticisms of the poet's failures goes a whole-hearted homage. We reckon the volume worth much more than many that pretend more.

Ward (James), Sc.D. (Cantab.), Hon. LL.D. (Edin.), Hon. D.Sc. (Oxon). PSYCHOLOGICAL PRINCIPLES. Cambridge University Press, i-xiv—478 pp., 21s. n.

Merely to dip into a book like this gives one the sense of exhilaration and contact with wide horizons which is only to be gained from the study of human progress in the light of divine origins. Dr. Ward does not, indeed, talk about divine origins: that is not his métier; but the figure of man emerges clothed with such dignity, and so obviously on the road to greater developments, from these fascinating pages that we are confirmed in a great "act of faith" as we read them. The concluding passages, in which the development of personality as the "central fact in the formation of character" is emphasised, are very interesting, as are the deductions to be drawn from the statement that "the religious genius" is "the most instructive for us in studying personality." In spite of acknowledged defects the book is a fine addition to our Ward library.

PAMPHLETS.

Armenia's Charter. Spottiswoode, Ballantyne & Co. 16 pp., 3d.

A series of letters expressing appreciation of the services of Armenians to the Allied cause by Lord Bryce, Mr. Lloyd George, M. Clemenceau, and others; issued by the Armenian Bureau.

Kozicki (Stanislas). THE POLES UNDER PRUSSIAN RULE. The Polish Press Bureau. 16 pp.

Kozicki (Stanislas). THE SOCIAL EVOLUTION OF POLAND IN THE NINETEENTH CENTURY. London, Hodder & Stoughton. 40 pp.

The first is a short brochure reprinted from The Nineteenth Century: the second comprises three lectures delivered at University College in May last by Mr. Kozicki, who is a recognised authority on Polish affairs. They are brought out under the auspices of the Polish National Committee, and should help to educate public opinion on the right lines at this critical juncture.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Dudley.—In connection with a recent effort to raise money for the local Prisoners of War Fund the members of The Old Meeting House congregation subscribed £435 0s. 1d. On Sunday afternoon, October 6, the minister, the Rev. E. Glyn-Evans, late R.A.M.C., conducted a Military Drumhead Service in the Dudley Market Place under the auspices of the Local Branches of the National Federation of Discharged and Demobilised Sailors and Soldiers. Several hundreds of men who have served in the war assembled from Dudley, Cradley, Netherton, Brockmoor, Pensnett and Tipton, and marched through the town with their magnificent banners. The imposing procession was headed by two brass bands, and when the parade was formed up for service a great multitude of townspeople gathered round. The Rev. E. Glyn-Evans was supported by the Deputy Mayor and other public men. A collection was taken for the Prisoners of War.

Ilford.—In accordance with the wishes of her father (the late Rev. T. E. M. Edwards), Miss Edwards has given the sum of £100 for the maintenance of the religious services of the Unitarian Church. The amount has been invested in War Loan in the names of Messrs. E. R. Fyson and J. G. Foster and the British and Foreign Unitarian Association (Incorporated), and the interest will be paid to the treasurer of the church and figure in the balance sheet as an "In Memoriam subscription, the Rev. T. E. M. Edwards." In the event of services at Ilford being discontinued, the income is to be devoted to the support of the religious services at one of the other congregations with which Mr. Edwards was closely associated, as may be decided by the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. At the close of the service on Sunday evening last these facts were reported to the congregation, and the following resolution was carried unanimously: "That this meeting of the Ilford congregation, having heard of the generous gift of Miss Edwards in memory of her father—and in accordance with his wishes—for the maintenance of the religious services of this church, of which he was the ever-faithful friend, desires to place on record its grateful appreciation of the kindly thought which prompted the bequest, and its earnest hope that this church which he founded may go on from strength to strength and become an ever increasing influence for good in this town and neighbourhood."

Leytonstone.—Leytonstone Free Church celebrated the completion of its first year of existence at a public meeting preceded by a tea, on Saturday, October 19. Nearly a score of those associated with the church and school were down with influenza, yet a most pleasant gathering was held under the chairmanship of Mr. H. G. Chancellor, M.P. A most encouraging report was presented by Miss Maud Burt who regretted that her co-Secretary, Miss Dorice Peterken, was absent through illness. The attendance at the evening services had recently much improved, but the most gratifying feature of the year's work was shown in the development of the Sunday School and Young People's Guild. The latter, which had a membership of thirty-seven, was under the presidency of Mrs. Frank Bonner and the secretaryship of Mrs. Sheridan Stevens, who abound in enthusiasm and energetic usefulness. Their performances of a musical play had been the means of raising a good sum for benevolent objects besides providing a delightful entertainment for the slum children of Hoxton. Recently a library and a magazine had been started and the boys had now the advantage of club rooms of their own. Reference was also made to the Concert-Services held on Sunday evenings, after the usual service, for the wounded soldiers at the Whipps Cross Military Hospital. Dr. H. Sand, the church treasurer, presented the financial statement showing a balance in hand of £3. The Rev. J. Arthur Pearson recalling the early struggles of the Leytonstone movement said it was gratifying to see so pleasant a prospect now opening out. Some words of encouragement were spoken by several visitors from other churches, including Mr. E. R. Fyson, ex-President of the Provincial Assembly, and Mr. Wm. Lee, of Wimbledon. Miss Brenda Fyson, L.R.A.M., contributed two beautifully rendered solos. Mr. J. W. Peterken, chairman of the church committee, having responded to the good wishes of visiting speakers, a very enjoyable first annual meeting came to an end.

Liverpool: The Ancient Chapel.—Commenting on the 300th Anniversary meetings on October 6 to which reference has already been made in our pages, the Calendar says: "No adequate idea of the appropriateness to the occasion of Dr. Jacks' sermon in the morning could be given in a summary, and therefore none will be attempted. It is sufficient to say that it was profoundly impressive, 'heart spoke to heart,' memories were awakened, and faith in the future was enriched by the witness of faith in former times."—Lieut. Owen Williams has been awarded the Military Cross.

Liverpool District Missionary Association.—The Liverpool District Association opened its winter session of special activities by holding a United Religious Service in Hope Street Church on Friday evening, October 4. Principal Jacks very kindly consented again to be the preacher, and, as was expected, he attracted a large congregation which included representatives from all the district churches, besides a number of other persons not connected with our denomination. The devotional part of the service was conducted by Dr. Mellor. Dr. Pollit presided at the organ, and his choir led the congregational singing and also rendered an anthem. Nothing could have been more helpful than such a service for intensifying the spiritual ideals of the Association and inspiring its members to put forth increased effort in the service of God and humanity. Dr. Jacks' sermon was an incentive and an encouragement especially to those whose opportunities might be few, for he showed that it was not essentially length of years or innumerable great deeds which made a man perfect, or enabled his life to be regarded as complete; but that completion and perfection were sometimes achieved in one supreme deed or the utterance of one undying truth. The Association is again arranging for a series of Religious Conferences at its constituent churches this winter, the first of which is to be held at Hamilton Road Domestic Mission, on Nov. 16. It has also started a joint advertising scheme, by which eleven of our Liverpool churches, and churches situated nearest the city, are advertised as a group in each Saturday's Liverpool Daily Post, with a statement of common principle printed at both beginning and end, namely: "The following churches stand for personal religion and Christian worship free from dogmatic restraint." Various other activities which war conditions render possible are also being organised. The difficulties in Liverpool as elsewhere are great; but it is keenly felt that everything possible should be done to prepare the churches for those new and increased demands which will be made upon them at the conclusion of the war.—A religious Conference will be held at the Hamilton Road Domestic Mission, Liverpool, on Saturday, November 16, at 6 o'clock, Mr. C. Sydney Jones presiding. The subject of discussion, 'Begin at the Beginning—a Word to the Churches,' will be dealt with by the Revs. W. Whitaker and C. M. Wright, and Mr. J. M. Heaney. In the afternoon a devotional Service will be conducted by Dr. Mellor.

London: Blackfriars Mission.—The work in connection with Blackfriars Mission and Stamford Street Chapel is curtailed in many directions, but there is a spirit abroad which promises well for the future. In spite of unfavourable weather the evening service on Oct. 20, on the occasion of the church anniversary, was well attended. The minister (the Rev. W. H. Stephenson) took for the subject of his address 'The Fathers of our Faith: their Ideals and Ours.' The Sunday School Anniversary Services are to be on Sunday, November 10. The Rev. J. A. Pearson will preach in the morning, and the Rev. Thomas Munn (who visited the church for the first time for the Harvest Festival) in the evening. During the past month the congregation have had the pleasure of welcoming amongst them Signaller A. MacLaren, late Secretary of the Scottish Unitarian Association. He joined a Sunday School Excursion to Richmond on September 28, has taken a class on Sunday afternoon, and also addressed the scholars at the concluding assembly.

London: Brixton.—The death is recorded in the Effra Road Unitarian Church Calendar of Miss Hilda Stanley, after a long and painful illness. She was a faithful worker in connection with the congregation, and gave valuable service in the work of the Sunday school.

London: Islington.—In addition to the services which Lieut.-Col. Bullock is rendering to Unity Church, the congregation has had the opportunity recently of hearing other earnest and able preachers from the United States who have come over to this country with the American troops. At one of the "platform meetings" last month Col. Bullock had the assistance of two Y.M.A.C. chaplains attached to the "Eagle Hut," and it was a novel and uplifting experience, says the Calendar, to hear three preachers in khaki expounding the high ideals with which America entered the war, and proclaiming the resolve to keep those ideals unstained until the time shall come to realise them in the victories of peace. This month's programme is equally noteworthy, and good attendances are hoped for. On November 3 Col. Bullock preaches in the morning; on November 10 the Rev. Thomas Chapman, State Superintendent, Universalist Church, Tennessee, U.S.A.; on November 17, the Rev. G. A. Mark, Dorchester, Mass. U.S.A., and on November 24, Col. Bullock again.—The death is recorded on October 8 of Mrs. Bull, a deeply respected member of the congregation, in her 82nd year. Mrs. Bull (née Tribe) was a life-long Unitarian, and a worshipper at Unity Church for many years. She was also a member of Dr. Tudor Jones's philosophy class.

St. Helen's.—The following resolution was passed after evening service at the Unitarian Church on Sunday last, October 27, and has been forwarded to the Prime Minister and the local press:—"That the congregation of the Unitarian Free Church, Corporation Street, St. Helen's, believing that the highest interest of the nation and of humanity will be served by a peace based on President Wilson's fourteen points, and also feeling assured that this represents the desire of the vast majority of the people of this country, calls upon the Prime Minister to use his powerful influence to consummate this desire at the earliest possible moment and so save the nation from that moral and spiritual degradation which a section of the press is inclining to bring about by a reduction of our ideals and honourable aims in the war."

South East Wales.—A meeting of women was held on Thursday, October 17, at the Unitarian Chapel, Pontypridd. Members of the Aberdare and Pontypridd branches were present. After a short introductory service conducted by Miss E. Rosalind Lee, Mrs. Lewis (President of the S.E. Wales Unitarian Association) took the chair. She drew the attention of those present to the two objects of the meeting, namely: to consider (1) ways and means by which we women may strengthen the life of the churches; (2) the relation of our religious principles to our new duties of citizenship involved in "the vote." Miss Lee gave an address pointing out the value of a well-organised League, especially in view of women's new duties, and suggesting that a District League might be a valuable means of bringing the women of the various congregations in S.E. Wales into closer touch. It was finally resolved unanimously "that steps be taken to form a District League, that each congregation connected with the S.E. Wales Unitarian Association be urged to form a Branch of the Central Women's League and become affiliated also to the local district League, and that Miss Lee be appointed Hon. Secretary to bring the question before the women in the various churches." It was also decided to accept the invitation of the Aberdare Branch to hold the next District Meeting at Aberdare on Tuesday, November 26.

Wakefield.—It is stated in the Westgate Chapel Calendar that Signaller Sidney Lockwood (Northumberland Fusiliers), who was reported missing on May 27, is now said to have been killed on that date. He was one of four men who were on outpost duty, and was evidently killed by shell-fire. Lockwood was little over 19 years of age and had only been at the front a few weeks. Many other members of the chapel have been wounded.

Wandsworth.—The Calendar of the Wandsworth Unitarian Church records the death in action of Pte. C. E. Thompson, 23rd Batt., Australian Imperial Force, aged 22.

York.—The Rev. Marshall B. Skelland has been made a member of the Nonconformist Ministers' Fraternal, and a member of a Committee appointed by the Nonconformist Churches for the purpose of house-to-house visitation in the city. He has organised a series of meetings to be held in St. Saviourgate Chapel to discuss 'Reconstruction' and 'A League of Nations.' Speakers at these meetings include ministers of the Presbyterian, Wesleyan, and Primitive Methodist Churches. It is noteworthy that one of the lecturers is a local Episcopalian vicar. The Society of Friends is also represented on the Syllabus.

Yorkshire Unitarian Union.—The Annual Meetings of the Union were held at Hunslet, Leeds, on Saturday, October 26. We hope to give further details next week.

The Neo-Platonists. A Study in the History of Hellenism.

By THOMAS WHITTAKER. Second edition, with a Supplement on the Commentaries of Proclus. Demy 8vo. 12s net.

Slight alterations only have been made in the text and notes of the book as it appeared in 1901, but the Appendix on the outlying subject of Gnosticism has, in view of recent research, been re-written, and in the Supplement on the Commentaries of Proclus, which is the feature of the new edition, a more circumstantial account of the Athenian period of Neo-Platonism is given.

By Rev. W. F. EVANS, M.D.

4s. 6d. net, post free.

This is the final volume of Dr. Evans' wonderful writings, by means of which hundreds of seekers after Truth and spiritual health have been blessed. It is not generally known that our Author was both a medical man—a homeopathist—and a minister. He was thus a scholar in an unusual and double sense. His knowledge of the body and the mind was accurate, and his insight into spiritual truth as well as the esoteric side of bodily functioning was deep and profound. He was a great healer by tuition. He realised that there is no true healing of the mind and soul without spiritual knowledge through tuition and intuition.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

All letters and manuscripts for the Editor should be sent to 13 Bream's Buildings, Fetter Lane, London, E.C.4. They must reach the Editor not later than Wednesday morning for publication the same week.

THE isolation of Germany from the military point of view is not less evident in the political sense. The cultivators of the policy of ruthlessness, the applauders of the sinking of the Lusitania, the singers of the 'Hymn of Hate,' are now finding the force of that ancient and never antiquated law that measures back to men what they measure out to others. Guarding our hearts and minds as we must lest we in our turn fall victim to ignoble passions, we do well to recognise that it is a divine law that is operating, and that the natural sentiments of humankind are in their reactions at least as directly grounded in the Will supreme as those of the laboratory. Hence the duty laid upon us as moral agents to bear our testimony in this hour of retribution. Turkish barbarism we loathe, Bulgarian trickery we despise, Austrian tyranny we denounce, but Germany's accumulation of loathsome cruelty, despicable trickery, abominable despotism, with its own peculiar quintessence of arrogant defiance of all moral law, needs more than a vocabulary to itself. What it needs, and if right is done will have, is the practical verdict of universal horror, aversion, and abiding mistrust.

THE eager haste of the Germans to secure an armistice, drastic as they knew the terms would be, is more eloquent of their sense of peril than any words could be. There is no need in this place to go over the circumstances which have driven the proudest and most boastful empire of modern times to this signal humiliation; but one of them, the internal ferment, is obviously significant not only to Germany but to Europe at large. In the hour of the great and overwhelming triumph of the Allied cause there exists fully enough to impose restraint upon all thoughtful minds. Gratitude truly inexpressible is ours, and humble prayer that our nation, along with its sister nations, may be wisely guided in the immensely difficult path which now opens before us. For the rest, we do well to bow the head in silence.

* * *

AMONG the representatives of Allied nations at the Versailles Council from which the Premier returned on Tuesday were those of the Czecho-Slovaks—a startling proof of the new order now springing out of the ruins of the Austrian Empire. It is very interesting to observe that Prof. Thomas G. Massaryk, whose portrait was recently displayed, along with President Wilson's, at Prague, the capital of this new Bohemian state, was a member of the International Council of Unitarians and other Free Churches and took part in the Boston Conference in 1907. His ardour for religious as well as political freedom is intense, and is combined with ripe scholarship; and he has a wholesome fear of all combinations, civic or ecclesiastical, which claim to have authority from God without being responsible to the people they set up to govern. Bohemia has a long history of religious liberalism, and we trust its development under such guidance as Massaryk's will continue true to its best traditions.

* * *

MUCH anxiety has been expressed, by Lord Bryce among others, lest the conditions of the armistice with Turkey involved an abandonment of Christians in the East to the rule which has been so hateful in the past. Anything more abhorrent to the feelings of people in this country could hardly be conceived; our warmest gratification in the victories of our forces in those parts has been in the thought of setting free those who have been so shockingly oppressed by the Turks. It is a great relief, therefore, to be assured officially that nothing of the kind has been arranged, and that the future of these poor people—the remnants left from frightful butcheries and starvation—is to be a subject of careful regard in the conclusions of peace.

THE death is announced of Dr. Andrew Dickson White, an American of rare distinction as scholar, author, and diplomatist. Born in 1832, he graduated at Yale and continued his studies at the Sorbonne and the University of Berlin. After a professorship of history and literature at Michigan, he helped to create and was first President of Cornell University from 1866 to 1885. His success as commissioner in several important affairs led to his appointment as U.S.A. Minister to Berlin 1879-81, followed, after two years in St. Petersburg, by the ambassadorship to Berlin 1897-1903. He was president of the American delegation at the Hague Conference 1899. His writings ranged over a wide field—education, politics, economics, criminal law &c.—and in one notable work entitled 'A History of the Warfare of Science with Theology in Christendom,' he rendered extremely valuable service to progressive religious thought.

WE quoted last week from Sir Robert Stout's address at Wellington Unitarian Church. Another passage deserves notice. Dealing with a subject that has caused far more heart-searching than has found expression among us, Sir Robert said: "We must have what is termed a State or a public conscience. We have heard much of late of 'private consciences.' It is well to have a conscience of some kind, it is well to be guided by moral considerations; but if a man or a woman sets his or her conscience above the dictates of the public conscience it does not bespeak an exalted moral attitude. I am not referring to those who are called 'conscientious objectors' to our laws. Some of them, as the Quakers, having an heredity and a history behind them, are honest. The Quakers have ever been forward in public services. There are some not Quakers whose 'conscientious' objections are but disloyalty to our State, and thinly-veiled treason. If in the peril which besets the State some of her citizens do not rise to help her to maintain her existence they certainly should not be allowed to take part in the governance of the community, nor allowed the liberty, privileges, and freedom that loyal citizens possess." We may note here that general assent was given last week, at the Unitarian meeting at Gorton, to the protest made by the President of our Association at the treatment meted out to some of the "conscientious objectors" in this country. Differing as he does and most of us do from the views of these men in relation to the war he feels, as we do, that in many cases they have been abominably treated.

THE prompt and generous response made this week to our appeal for the Belgian Fund encourages a hope that this most meritorious piece of work will continue to receive substantial reinforcement. Referring readers for details to our article on the subject last week, we will only remind them here that we want to see the list of donors greatly enlarged between now and Christmas—with a special spurt at Christmas itself, when the 200th weekly list will appear. It will be seen that the Italian occupation of Trieste and the virtual surrender of Constantinople have speedily opened the purse once more of the good friend who offered "ten fives" for ten victories, for the benefit of the Lawrence House Fund. We again beg our friends to help in clearing this bit of money-raising out of the way of larger—though not necessarily more attractive—things. The list, in any case, must be soon withdrawn.

LIBERATION OF LILLE.

(October 28, 1918.)

"LANCASHIRE lads are in Lille to-day!"
Blow the bugle and beat the drum,
Let voices shout that have long been dumb,

And flowers and garlands bedeck the way.

"Lancashire lads are in Lille to-day!"
The people crowd to the City's mart,
Pallid and thin, but with beating heart,
They wave their flags and they kneel and pray.

"Vengeance is mine and I will repay;"
My agents ye are," saith the voice of the Lord.

"Ye Lancashire lads, sheathe not your sword—

Where are the daughters of Lille this day?"

And those soldiers there are who fell by the way,

Whose names are cherished in love and pride;

For this they fought and for this died,
They too were in spirit in Lille that day.

Lancashire lasses are proud and gay

At Bolton and Bury and Pendle Hill

At the weaver's loom in shed or in mill
They think of their lads in Lille this day.

On history's page in the years far away

This story spun on the loom of Time,

Will put on record in deathless rhyme
That Lancashire lads were in Lille that day.

S. M. O.

AFTER SEVENTY YEARS.

HORACE WALPOLE, we have been reminded, wrote in 1759: "We are forced to ask every morning what victory there is, for fear of missing one." We too, and even more than he, have had our marvellous months, and so great have been the victories, one after another, that only one more is greatly longed for by most of us. At the moment, however, it is a different quotation that appears most apt. Writing in 1848 Richard Cobden said: "We get astounding news from the Continent, a fresh revolution or dethronement by every post." Here, also, we may say, so many are the vanished figures from the royal and imperial stage that only one more exit is awaited with much interest. We have reached, indeed, one of the world's most memorable epochs, the closing of a long chapter.

Seventy years ago, as Cobden's words recall, Europe was shaken in every quarter. According to their interests and disposition men cherished the brightest hopes or were the prey of the gloomiest fears. The same energetic French leaven that had thrust upward at the Revolution, had burst through the surface of things once more; and symptoms of a similar nature were now to be seen in many lands. Within a few weeks of the abdication of Louis Philippe Vienna was in revolt, and while Germany had her bad quarter of an hour people in this country were in terror of the Chartists. It seemed the end, or the beginning, of all things. Huge uprisings such as these might, indeed, lead to anything. The great masses of mankind seemed to be thoroughly inflamed at last, and the tinsel appeared to be finally doomed. Had not Pius IX. himself stood forth as a champion of popular rights—a portent to make all vested interests tremble? Liberty and Nationalism, two of the most abstract of abstractions, were mysteriously enough the concretest of forces in that present world. Seventy years after they are more powerful than ever, while to reinforce them another idea is rapidly coming into the mind of man—Internationalism.

The uprisings of 1848 were, apparently, soon laid. Disillusion and disappointment took the place of expectation. In France the voters overwhelmingly chose Louis Napoleon to be president of their new republic, and accepted him later as Emperor. In Germany the constitution-makers at Frankfurt talked a good deal to little purpose, and meantime the military machine was started which, by way of the Dannewerk, Königgrätz, and Sedan, has rolled at last to the edge of the abyss. The "liberal" pope settled on his lees, and, once more, as after Waterloo, the autocrats seemed all round to have gripped the reins afresh. Will that be the sequel of the present world-wide revolt against their system? The answer is in the keeping of destiny, but the forecast is at least a possibility. Surely, the system of autocracy, which has received so signal a defeat in the great empires of Europe, can never be revived unless the peoples of Europe, in addition to a forgetfulness that would amount to mere insanity, fail to learn how certainly Liberty depends on law-abiding, and unless they are deluded by self-seeking and wily politicians into supposing that to be patriotic means to be nationally egotistic and selfish.

One fact differentiates the present time from the age which we cannot help recalling at this juncture. There were great armies then, as such things were reckoned, but to-day whole nations are in arms. The entire population of the belligerent countries, and hardly less that of the European neutrals, have been swept into the whirlpool of war. Fraternity was doubtless then a real sentiment with some of the multitude in many lands, and with large numbers in one or two. We may believe that after four years of comradeship on the battlefield the feeling of companionship for peace as well as for war will have been more widely diffused than it has ever been before. But, obviously, there is not only this feeling of comradeship to trust to; there is the feeling of immense fear. Men are driven to contemplate, and to resolve upon, a League of Nations not at all from pure philanthropy, but in the instincts of self-preservation. They are once for all convinced beyond risk of wavering that to commit their destinies to the hands of a few irresponsible monarchs, intoxicated with a belief in their divine right to lord it over mankind, is to court disaster. Victor Hugo, in his grand manner, pictured a rainbow arch of hope spanning the United States of Europe. To-day even some of the Germans, it appears, have come reluctantly to acknowledge that their militarist philosophy has not paid, and they are writing about the United States of the World.

Thus, after seventy years the forces that make for the deliverance of mankind are again and more potently at work. None but an imbecile or a fool, to use Lord Robert Cecil's words, will minimise the vast difficulties that are ahead; but none but a criminal against mankind will in the pursuit of selfish interests evade the task that is now before all the civilised peoples of the globe. At the present moment we watch breathlessly the final stages of the struggle against that fatal system which has cost so much to destroy. In order that the destruction may be complete men refuse to compute what the process still costs. But the days of reflection will follow these days of effort, and mankind would be truly a hopeless thing if it could not be trusted to profit by lessons so bitter. The duty of every thoughtful person is, now and in the immediate future, to bring home to his fellow-citizens the true significance and immense issues of the epoch now beginning.

OUR Boston friends, who greatly appreciate the hospitable reception of their soldiers by Unitarians in this country, have issued a card of introduction for their men. The Icelandic Church at Winnipeg, about 40 of whose members have come across, has given them a special card for similar use, and we hope to hear that these introductions have led to the kindly welcomes intended.

BOOKS AND REVIEWS.

DR. JACKSON'S 'FOURTH GOSPEL.'

HAVING been all my life a student (in quite a modest way) of the problem of the Fourth Gospel, I have read this book*—so wide in its scope, so scholarly in its spirit, above all, so impartial in its judgments—with the greatest interest, and, I hope, with considerable profit. Hitherto I had been inclined to think (so far in agreement with my brother the late Dr. James Drummond) that it was at least possible that the author might be the Apostle John, the son of Zebedee, the main question being whether a work so inconsistent with the synoptic tradition and so remote from the world of reality could have come from a personal follower of Jesus. That such a view, though favoured by the external evidence, is nevertheless untenable, is, I think, pretty conclusively shown by Dr. Jackson; and against the received view of John, son of Zebedee, having lived to a great age in Ephesus, he sets another tradition coming from the lost work of Papias, to the effect that John, no less than his brother James, had, in accordance with the prophecy of Jesus (Mark x. 39), met with a martyr's death long previous to any date to which the gospel can be referred. Accordingly, the conclusion to which I have been brought by the perusal of Dr. Jackson's book is this: the Fourth Gospel was written about the year A.D. 100 by a Palestinian Jew resident in Ephesus, whose name may very probably have been John, and who may quite possibly have been the person known as John the Presbyter, but who, at any rate, was not the Apostle. To this I think our author would give a qualified assent, and would add that the evangelist either wrote under the authority of the Beloved Disciple, or, less probably, was himself that disciple (p. 48), and therefore a personal follower of Jesus. But here I find it very tempting to diverge and say, the evangelist was indeed himself the Beloved Disciple and yet not really an eye-witness! The evangelist knew nothing of Jesus save through the synoptic gospels and his own intuitions, but believing that he did know him in this way, in all the fulness of his glory and his love, he saw no more effective way of intimating this knowledge than by introducing himself into his symbolical narrative as an actor in the scene. Only thus, it seems to me, do we get the full significance of the scene at the Last Supper where the Beloved Disciple is represented as reclining on the bosom of Jesus. It is the same figure as we have in John i. 18, where it is said: "The only begotten Son, who is in the bosom of the Father, he hath declared him." Such knowledge as the Son has of the Father, as intimate and as full, is thus clearly claimed for this particular disciple in relation to his Lord. Dr. Jackson gives it as his opinion that whoever the Beloved Disciple may have been he was not an Apostle. Certainly not, from the point of view just expressed, any more than from his own. But I must think it was intended that he should be taken for one, if not even, as has actually happened, for the son of Zebedee.

Of course, every one has noticed the inconsistencies in the Fourth Gospel—the strong materialism of some passages contrasted with the high spirituality of others, the depreciation of miracles here and the importance attached to them elsewhere. St. John, it may be noticed, is the only evangelist who, not content with recording a miracle, supplies apparent evidence that one has really been performed: the cure of the nobleman's son, e.g., at the moment when Jesus spoke the word. I have elsewhere attempted to account for these inconsistencies by the suggestion that the evangelist has in view the two distinct classes of readers—those who will not believe without signs and wonders and the more spiritually minded to whom "it is given to know the mysteries of the kingdom of Heaven"—a distinction apparently recognised by Jesus himself (Matt. xiii. 11).* This is to me a more satisfactory explanation than any theory of partition, even though the presence of interpolations cannot, of course, be denied.

On one point I must differ from Dr. Jackson. While recognising the symbolism of the seven "signs" recorded by St. John he says: "It is impossible to believe that the stories are of his own construction." But why so? It is surely the simplest way of accounting for them. Some, of course, are borrowed more or less completely from the synoptics. But take, e.g., the story of Lazarus. If not a narrative of facts it must have been invented by someone, and who more likely to have invented it than the writer of the gospel? Or, again, take the story of Thomas implying the corporeal revival of Jesus. To those who do not accept the miracle in its most literal form, it is surely obvious that the story is suggested by, and based on, Luke xxiv. 36-40. Once grasp the idea that this whole gospel is a symbolical narrative having only a slight foundation in historical fact and no repugnance will be felt to this proposition.

Dr. Jackson has evidently read widely on his subject, and I should be surprised if it was found possible to name a single German or Dutch writer whom he has overlooked. But he seems to have rather neglected his own countrymen. He does not mention that the first theologian of repute in England to question the authenticity of the Fourth Gospel was the Rev. J. J. Tayler. He nowhere mentions Martineau's contribution to the subject in his 'Seat of Authority'; and, strangest of all, he makes no reference to Dr. Abbot's remarkable article in the 'Encyclopædia Biblica.' This last omission may suggest that to make his work complete a chapter on the symbolism of the Gospel is rather a desideratum. Even as it is, however, I think it may fairly be pronounced a very able and eminently judicial summing up of an age-long controversy.

ROBERT B. DRUMMOND.

THE third party of American editors who have come over to this country at the invitation of the Ministry of Information as guests of the British Government to see Britain's war effort at first hand arrived in London last week. It includes: Dr. Douglas MacKenzie, President of Hartford Theological Seminary; Ernest Hamlin Abbott, Editor of The Outlook (the journal of which Colonel Roosevelt became Associate Editor on the termination of his Presidency); Dr. Clifton Grey, Editor of The Chicago Standard; Philip Howard, Associate Editor of the Sunday School Times; Guy Shippler, Associate Editor of The Churchman, and others. The party, which has been entertained to lunch by the Minister of Information, and by the English Speaking Union, are to visit the Fleet, the Front, and Ireland.

WE learn from The Manchester Guardian that "Adam Bede's Cottage" was offered for sale recently at Ashbourne. It is situated in the straggling hamlet of Roston, near Norbury—the "Norbur" of the novelist—and there is reason for believing that at one time the father of George Eliot, who stood in part for the portrait of Adam Bede, resided in the house, which is at least 140 years old.

THE BISHOP OF HEREFORD.

ON Sunday, October 20, the Bishop of Hereford preached at Eignbrook Congregational Church in that city. This was surely a noteworthy event. Nothing like it, says a correspondent, has happened since the Act of Uniformity. The former bishop, Dr. Perceval, was a man of broad sympathies and very friendly to Nonconformists, but he was cautious, and although he was always ready to join them in social and educational effort, and on one occasion invited them to take part with him in the Communion Service at the Cathedral, he would not speak in a Nonconformist Church or open a Nonconformist bazaar for fear of "wounding tender consciences." It is satisfactory to find that Dr. Henson is faithful to his convictions and is pursuing the same course now as before his promotion, only with greater freedom.

The position claimed by Dr. Henson in relation to the Free Churches is unusual and little known and understood. In his book entitled 'The Relation of the Church of England to the other Reformed Churches,' he writes as follows: "There is nothing in the Constitution or in the law of the Established Church of England which compels or permits that rigid ecclesiastical isolation, which now generally obtains, and which unquestionably is a consequence of the adoption of Tractarian principles by a large section of the English clergy." "The great difficulty of orders is one which Episcopacy has created, and it is one which the Episcopal Church must remove. I do not see how High Church notions and claims can ever amalgamate with ours, or that we can listen for a moment to proposals which invalidate our orders (and discredit and censure our ministry) and those of other Protestant churches."

"It is being discovered with relief that the present isolation of the Church of England is required neither by its formularies, nor its traditions. Intercourse with other churches is becoming more common and more intimate and in the wake of intercourse is growing a salutary disgust of the bigotry which separates fellow Christians and forbids their union in work and worship."

"It is the right and, on the other hand also, the duty of every member of the Church of England, who values the heritage of spiritual liberty implied in his membership of a Reformed Church, to communicate with the other Reformed Churches, wherever and whenever the opportunity to do so may be given to him. So doing, he will assuredly be true to the principles and the traditions of his own Reformed Church."

It may be well also to quote a short passage from Dr. Henson's sermon at the Congregational Church: "Since the Reformation our religious history falls into two parts. First, there was the period in which an uniform national system of Christianity was aimed at by legal coercion and when coercion had clearly failed, by comprehension. It was then the practically universal assumption that religious uniformity was politically indispensable. The stoutness of the Puritans and the disloyalty of the Stuarts combined to convince the nation that there were worse dangers than religious variety. Then followed the period in which uniformity having failed, division was acquiesced in. Toleration put a term to the religious persecution, though it was grudgingly conceded, and not until our own time received complete expression. A great amelioration of ecclesiastical temper was secured. There was a great dying down of ecclesiastical bitterness and a great dying down of religious feuds. But a kind of torpor spread over Church and Nonconformity until the rise of the Methodists." "Now we have reached a point at which we are beginning to see that while the Toleration Act and its consequential legislation solved the old political problem—how to combine religious dissidence with civic security—the religious problem, how to secure Christian unity apart from visible religious fellowship remains unsolved."

It may be said that these words of the Bishop do not carry us very far and that his interpretation of the legal position of the Church will be denied by most of his brethren, but surely it is worth something that they should be held by a dignitary of the Church; and the courage he has shown in breaking through the custom of ages will be a real encouragement to those who believe in unity of spirit even when ecclesiastical amalgamation is impossible.

TAMED, YET UNCONQUERED.

THE other day one of our officers on the Belgian front went with a wagon around the country seeking forage for his "beasties." He came to one big farm which he thought was deserted; however, in answer to knocking, an old man appeared. Seeing a soldier, a flame of fear sprang up in his pale eyes. The officer asked: "Pardon, monsieur, elles sont à vous, ces légumes-la?"—pointing to a scrubby trampled garden with a few withering turnips in it. Without any reply he opened the garden gate and in a shaking voice said, "Prenez tous, à votre plaisir, monsieur." The Huns had evidently well-tamed him, anyway. The visitor tried to explain that he only wanted some straw, but the old man threw open all his doors and said, "Tout est à votre plaisir, monsieur; seulement" (seeing perhaps a gleam of pity in the Englishman's eye) "laissez-moi quelques navets à manger. Il faut vivre, en tout cas."

Finally, he told his story. Himself a widower, aged 72, the Huns had taken everything from him, cows, horses, crops, and the daughter who looked after him, and destroyed all the farm implements before they left. He had been 48 hours with no food until the English came. "Ils m'ont pris," cried he with tears in his bleary eyes, "ils m'ont pris dix-sept vaches, un taureau magnifique, douze chevaux, et six mulets; ils ne m'ont rien laissé; et ma fille, ma jolie Hélène..." the big tears ran down his furrowed cheeks. He shewed the shell-holes near his house, although the house was untouched, and said, "Les obus m'ont tous passé—c'est parceque j'ai prié à la Vierge... elle écoute les prières des pauvres gens." Hardly knowing what to say, the officer murmured, "Mais oui, monsieur; nos prières ne sont pas perdues." The old man looked at him keenly and said: "Tenez, mon lieutenant, je suis bon Catholique, jamais je ne fais tort à personne; et le saint Jésus nous a commandés de pardonner à nos ennemis leur malfaits. Le matin et le soir je prie à genoux que le bon Dieu pardonne les Allemands... qu'il me ramène ma belle Hélène." The fierce, loving, broken, starving old man stood bare-headed in the autumn sunshine with wet cheeks and shaking frame. Poor old fellow; alone and starving in the silence of his desolate homestead—yet praying for forgiveness for the authors of his misery. Certainly, the Huns had never conquered him.

A SERMON entitled 'Freedom,' preached by Mr. H. G. Chancellor, M.P., at Ilkley Baptist Chapel on October 6, will be issued as a pamphlet supplement with the next number of The Christian Commonwealth.

CORRESPONDENCE.

WAR BONUS FOR MINISTERS.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—It will be remembered that last year, in view of the difficulties in which ministers with small incomes are placed because of war conditions, a Christmas bonus was, by the co-operation of the Sustentation Fund and the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, given to ministers of congregations. The difficulties are certainly no less this year, and the two Societies are making provision once more for the same purpose.

(a) The Sustentation Fund will continue its Christmas bonus of £5 to all its beneficiaries; and an additional bonus to such of its beneficiaries whose income from all sources does not exceed £200, of £5, or of £10, to those who have two or more children wholly dependent upon them.

(b) The British and Foreign Unitarian Association and the Sustentation Fund will co-operate in providing the money necessary for a bonus of £10 or £15 to ministers of congregations, qualified as above, who are not beneficiaries of the Sustentation Fund.

This will mean a greater drain than last year on the funds of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, as the extra £5 to married ministers with two or more children wholly dependent upon them is a new departure, which no doubt will be generally approved. Friends who would like to take a share in supporting this effort are invited to send their contributions to the Treasurer of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, Mr. George W. Brown, Essex Hall, Essex Street, Strand, W.C.2.

By the time this letter appears the circulars will be issued to ministers likely to come within the range of the scheme. Any minister, qualified for the bonus, who does not receive a circular may have one on application to the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie at Essex Hall.

THE YORKSHIRE UNITARIAN UNION.

THE annual meeting of the Yorkshire Unitarian Union held on Saturday, Oct. 26, was preceded by divine service in Joseph Street Unitarian Church, Hunslet, Leeds, conducted by the Rev. E. Gwilym Evanst of Dukinfield, who preached an earnest, and timely sermon upon the words "For other foundation can no man lay than that is laid, which is Jesus Christ." The preacher made a number of excellent applications of his message to the pressing circumstances of the hour.

At the meeting which followed the chair was taken by Mr. G. E. Verity, in the absence under medical advice of the president, Mr. Grosvenor Talbot, J.P. Apologies for unavoidable absence were received from the Revs. W. L. Schroeder, (Halifax,) T. M. Falconer, (Hull,) and J. Marshall Skelland (York). The committee's report, read by the secretary, the Rev. W. R. Shanks, gave a survey of the activities of the Union and referred to much faithful work done by ministers and people during the year, and to the life and earnestness that had been maintained despite the absence of many helpers whom the war had called away.

The treasurer, pro tem., Mr. Simeon Hall, presented the accounts. The draft balance-sheet showed the receipts to have been about normal, while the expenditure had increased on several items to over £100 in excess of the estimate. A portion of stock had been sold and the Hargrove Fund had been invested in war stock. The state of the finances called for care in the expenditure during the forthcoming year and an earnest effort on the part of the churches to increase their contributions.

Mr. F. Clayton, Secretary of the Lay Preachers Union, read the report of the services rendered during the year by the Lay Preachers. One new member had joined the Union, and the members had conducted 158 services in five chapels.

The adoption of the reports and balance-sheet was moved by Mr. C. Stainer, seconded by Mr. F. G. Jackson, and a vote of thanks to the retiring officers and the election of officers for the ensuing year, proposed by the Rev. J. S. Mathers, and seconded by Rev. R. A. Dickson, was passed. A vote of thanks to the Lay Preachers for their devoted services during the year was also passed.

After tea, provided by the Hunslet friends, the evening meeting was held, Mr. G. E. Verity presiding. The subject dealt with by the speakers was 'Our Relation to the Question of the Union of the Churches.'

The Rev. M. Evans agreed with the preacher of the sermon that afternoon that there could be no other foundation for a Union of the churches than that laid by Christ. Our group of churches should be able to unite more easily than others, as we were already agreed that the essential things could be summed up in the two commandments—"Hear, O Israel," and "Love thy neighbour as thyself." Unitarians believed in the unity of life and that was the broadest basis they could have. Underlying their life was found the reality of communion with God.

The Rev. R. A. Dickson held that the time was ripe for the development of a league of churches. If we contrasted the picture of England of fifteen hundred years ago with that of to-day we should see the advantages of Union. They should cultivate the art of mutual respect. That would be a step towards Union. He had applied the principle in connection with the public lectures at Huddersfield. Men of all shades of opinion, representatives of all parties, had been brought to speak upon the same platform with mutual advantage to all.

The Rev. A. Cobden Smith asked what was to be done with the man outside the churches? We ought to demonstrate the reality of our Christian fellowship and Unitarians should not be less willing than others to take a part in a movement for union. He desired the Unitarian to take his stand publicly in regard to the question of union, as having had religious experience equally with the orthodox. The obstacles in the way of union were not due so much to the Laymen as to the orthodox ministers.

Mr. W. Skelton briefly contended that to live in the spirit of Unitarian principles and ideals was to feel nothing attractive nor to see any great advantage in the proposal for union. Their outlook and that of the orthodox churches sprang from different conceptions of life and the world. Every Pope had sought for the Union of Christendom. Their concern was to live for freedom.

Other speakers, including the Revs. J. W. Maw, J. S. Mather, A. L. Smith. Messrs. C. H. Boyle and E. O. Dodgson, traversed similar lines of argument, the chief insistence being on the need for unity of the spirit in the bonds of love. The Rev. W. R. Shanks, who closed the discussion, said the only Union which would be worth striving for must be based upon the recognition of an obligation laid upon every individual and denomination, namely, the obligation to love God and man.

THE WOMEN'S LEAGUE.

A GENERAL Meeting of the British League of Unitarian and other Liberal Christian Women was held on Saturday, October 26, in connection with the autumnal gatherings of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association at Brookfield Church, Gorton. The meeting was held in the beautiful church and was very well attended by both men and women. The Central Committee was represented by Miss Clephan of Leicester; Miss Grace Mitchell, Secretary of the Fellowship Committee, and Miss H. Brooke Herford, Secretary of the League. The short opening service was conducted by Miss Alack of the Upper Brook Street congregation. Miss Clephan presided at the meeting, the chief feature of which was an address by Miss Mitchell on the development of the Fellowship work and the ideals at which it aims. Miss Mitchell described its small beginnings and showed how it had grown as the women realised what it might mean to them and through them to the life of our churches. She told of the increasing number of lonely women and girls who, while separated by circumstances from their own churches, were finding spiritual companionship and friendship with the help of the Fellowship Committee. There were also ways in which the League tried to draw the women of the home congregations into closer touch with their sisters in the overseas churches so that a greater mutual interest and desire for co-operation might be aroused between them. To this end many "Friendly links" had been established, and a friendly interchange of letters promoted between English girls and the girls over there. The Committee had before them the possibility of greatly increased emigration after the war, and were glad to say that those who went from out our churches would find, wherever they settled, friends of their own faith to welcome them in the new country. The Fellowship Committee had also carried out arrangements by which hospitality and friendly intercourse through correspondence was provided for men from the over-seas churches. Long lists of names of these men had been sent over to the Committee. Miss Mitchell has made this Fellowship work peculiarly her own, putting into it the whole force of her energies and her enthusiastic belief in its ideals. That her hearers were deeply interested and stirred was evident from the close attention given to her earnest and inspiring appeal for their sympathy and co-operation.

In the unavoidable absence of Mrs. Athelstan Tayler, who has the work in hand, Miss Brooke Herford described the scheme of the Foreign Committee for befriending the Unitarian soldiers from the American churches. It is run on much the same lines as that for the benefit of the overseas men. In response to the invitation to give in names of their men-folk the Women's Alliance have sent a list of over 100 correspondents, and hostesses have been found for a large proportion; but there are more difficulties in the way than in the case of the overseas visitors. At any rate, it is evident that whatever the result, the mothers in America are very grateful indeed for any kindness that may be shown to their sons while over here.

LONDON DISTRICT UNITARIAN SOCIETY.

A CONFERENCE of ministers and church officers was called at Essex Hall on Saturday last to consider "What shall be the attitude of the churches to industrial conditions as affected by the war." Dr. C. Herbert Smith presided, and there was a large attendance. In introducing the subject Dr. J. Lionel Tayler considered his subject under two heads: (1) Lesser industrial changes; and (2) Greater industrial outlooks. Under the former heading he touched on the questions of: (i.) demobilisation; (ii.) reparative effort; (iii.) return to pacific industry and the releasing of the present bureaucratic control; (iv.) post-war labour conditions; and (v.) man, woman, parentage and industry. He did not think it our duty as church people to adopt a definite political tone, but held that our churches should develop the social side of our religious activities, so as to be able to give a higher tone to the social outlook of our time. Under the heading 'Greater industrial outlooks,' he discussed, very briefly the following questions:—(i.) Are we to have in our Empire revolution or evolution? and held that the general sanity and freedom would preserve us from the former. (ii.) Can we better satisfy men's and women's lives by higher education?—the problem of the adolescent and, perhaps, adult education. (iii.) Have we begun to see, as the result of war expenditure, a new and more generous economic outlook? i.e., one that is not going to exploit any class. (iv.) Is the old, pre-war view of civil life to be replaced by a more active and adventurous social ideal? He concluded by saying that, while favouring the thought of a League of Nations, he favoured especially the idea of an adventurous peace, which, because it was adventurous, would satisfy the best of the war ideals and yet draw us to its Light and ultimately lead nations into one greater unity. What could our churches do? What could they not do if they would? An animated discussion was led by the President, who was followed by Colonel Bullock, the Revs. A. A. Charlesworth and A. H. Dolphin, Mr. Gibberd, Mr. Walls, the Rev. J. A. Pearson, and Mr. R. W. Sorenson. Approaching the subject from widely different points of view, the speakers urged that the principles which brought them together in religious fellowship should be translated into concrete facts of life, and that the individual should get his chance, both individually and socially.

NOTES ON SOME RECENT BOOKS.

[A short Notice in this column does not preclude a review in a later issue.]

Bolton (J. S.), M.D. THE MEANING OF PAIN. Barnes & Humby, Nottingham. 1s. 6d. post free.

A very helpful and sane, though brief, study of a subject in which we are all compelled to be interested. Dr. Bolton holds that the "groaning together" of the whole creation which has continued until now will be a thing of the past when we live more harmonious lives and obey the mental and physical laws which save the body from disease.

Hare (William Loftus). AN ESSAY ON PRAYER. Theosophical Publishing House. 75 pp., 2s. 6d.

A great deal of erudition is compressed into Mr. Hare's little book, in which he has attempted to describe the origins and manifestations of that attitude to the infinite expressed throughout the ages in prayer and meditation, and to throw some light upon the experiences thus obtained. Too much has certainly been attempted for such a small volume; but Mr. Hare has performed his task in an able manner, and has exercised good judgment in the selection of passages from the ancient writers, notably Plato and Plotinus.

MAGAZINES AND REVIEWS.

The R.P.A. Annual. The Modern Churchman.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Bury: Bank Street.—It is announced in the Calendar that John Wild, Grenadier Guards, was killed in action in France, August 21, aged 25 years; that James Alfred Walker, 10th Royal Warwicks, died in hospital, in England, from shell wounds in the head, September 1, aged 21 years; that Harry Greenhalgh, Lancashire Fusiliers, died October 1, in hospital, in England, after operation, from heart failure through having been previously gassed in France, aged 25 years.

Bury: Chesham.—The members of Chesham Unitarian Church heard with great sorrow of the death of 2nd Lieut. John Schofield and Private Joseph Taylor. Both for a long period were regular attenders at the Sunday school, and had endeared themselves to their many colleagues by their quiet, unassuming manner, and willingness to work and give of their best for the school they loved so dearly.

Chowbent.—Taking advantage of the widespread agitation caused in the district by the exclusion of Unitarians from the Council of Christian Congregations, the Rev. J. J. Wright took for the subjects of his Sunday evening addresses during October the following: Oct. 6, 'Less Creed: More Christ'; Oct. 13, 'Theology and Religion—the Difference'; Oct. 20, 'A Unitarian's Religion'; Oct. 27, 'Wherein all Churches Agree.' These addresses are now being followed up by a new series in November and December. On Nov. 3 he took for his subject 'Christ's Own Christianity'; on Nov. 10 he will deal with 'Christianity as Christ Preached it'; Nov. 17, 'Christianity as Written Down by the Reporters'; Nov. 24, 'Christianity as Theologised by the Apostles and Others'; Dec. 1, 'How Persecution and Power changed Christ's Christianity'; Dec. 8, 'Doctrine and Dogma: The Difference'; Dec. 15, 'Creeds, if you like—but no more Dogmatic Curses'; Dec. 22, 'Religion now turning Away from Dogma to Christ's Own Spirit again.' Nearly 1200 copies of the printed sermon on 'No Exclusion in Religion' have been sold.

Colne.—The Quarterly Meeting of members of the Unitarian church was held after evening service on Sunday, October 27, Mr. J. W. Robinson presiding. The Secretary's report showed a further increase in the attendances, and the Treasurer's report was also considered very satisfactory, the offertories having been higher than for many previous years. During November and December the minister, the Rev. Jesse Pipkin, proposes to deliver a course of Sunday evening sermons on Religion, Labour, and Literature, which are being specially advertised. Work is proceeding satisfactorily for a Sale of Work which has been arranged for Saturday, November 30th.

Failsworth.—The interest manifested in the chapel services since the holidays has been very gratifying, and the good attendances at the Harvest Services and Sunday School Anniversary Services, in addition to the Sunday school itself, have cheered officers and teachers alike. The various institutions have made a good start for the winter, and it is hoped that there will be a marked expansion in every department when the men at the front return. Over £40 has been raised by the Young Ladies' Class for Christmas parcels for sailors and soldiers connected with the chapel.

Irish Churches.—The Non-Subscribing Presbyterian records the death in France from wounds on October 10 of 2nd Lieut. Arthur A. Gault, Royal Dublin Fusiliers, only son of Mr. and Mrs. John Gault, Belgrano, Larne Harbour. A memorial notice also appears of Mr. Thomas Bryans of Clark Hill, Annsborough, which took place on September 24. He was a native of Banbridge, and early in life came under the influence of Mr. John Smyth, and was a member of the Sunday school and the church choir, and a member of the Rechabite Society in connection with our church in Banbridge. About 20 years ago he settled at Annsborough, where he won for himself a large circle of friends, and was highly respected by every class in the district as was proved by the large concourse of friends on the day of his funeral. On the following Sunday, in Clough Unitarian Church, the Rev. J. D. Davies referred to the loss the congregation had sustained. "It was," he said, "the loss of a godly man—pure in heart, mind, and life—unassuming, sociable, and kindly in disposition and never aggressive in his views or spirit. He was a man who lived and loved his faith, ever mindful of Christ's principles of life; he was strict and straight in conduct; a conscientious Rechabite all his days, and faithful in his work and to all his obligations. For many years he had been a faithful member, a most regular attender of the church at Clough, as well as a Committee man, and a member of the choir."

The Newry congregation has recently lost two of its members by death. Miss Hill of Derramore, Bessbrook, a member of a respected family long connected with the congregation, passed away, after a long illness, patiently borne, on Sunday, October 13; and Miss Rachel J. Mitchell, fifth daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Mitchell, died very suddenly on Thursday, October 10, of pneumonia. Only 17 years of age, she was a faithful member both of the school and choir, and her death is much regretted. Downpatrick.—Capt. N. Johnston-Cochrane of Downpatrick, who has served in the Ulster Division since its formation, and is a zealous member of the Downpatrick congregation, has been awarded the Military Cross. —The Minister, the Rev. R. Philipson, and the Rev. J. A. Kelly (Dunmurry) have received long and interesting letters from the Rev. A. Whitford of Moneyrea, who has been undergoing some exciting experiences while serving with the Y.M.C.A.

Leeds: Holbeck.—The death is recorded, after a brief illness, of Mr. Vernon Pearson, second son of Mr. and Mrs. B. Pearson, and formerly a scholar and member of the congregation. A young man of promise, advancing rapidly in his profession in connection with a well-known firm of constructional engineers at Loughborough, and but recently married, he has been suddenly cut off in his 25th year. —2nd Lieut. H. Gledhill, M.G. Corps, who has recently been awarded the M.C., won this distinction as the result of his gallant action in covering "the retirement of the infantry on an exposed flank under circumstances of great difficulty, remaining in the open and engaging the enemy at short range until almost surrounded. He was subsequently wounded in three places, but remained with his men until late in the evening, when he had his wounds dressed, and at once returned to his sub-section, whom he led out of the line, when they were relieved. His personal courage and example encouraged his men to hold on to their positions, and largely contributed to the success with which the infantry were able to reorganise." This is typical of the indomitable courage and devotion to duty which characterises the men of our churches, no less than those of other communions, at the front. —Lieut. Peirce, R.F.A., nephew of the Rev. W. R. and Mrs. Shanks, has been awarded the M.C., and promoted to the rank of Captain.

Leeds: Hunslet.—The Record announces that "a week of Four Services, a Social Gathering, and a Lecture has been begun. The Rev. E. Gwilym Evans gave a stirring sermon on Sunday evening, the 27th, which called our Church and all Christian Churches to more faithful living in the spirit of Christ." The Jubilee Fund has begun well; and it is hoped that all members and friends will contribute as soon as possible, in order that the church may have done its best before making a public appeal. The Yorkshire Unitarian Union held its Annual Meeting (described on another page) at Hunslet Unitarian Church on Saturday, October 26. Early in October an excellent Concert was given on behalf of the Soldiers and Sailors' Comforts Fund, by a party from the Reserve Battery, H.A.C., Chapeletown Barracks. The teachers provided refreshments afterwards, and a substantial addition was made to the Fund. —The death of William Wallis in action is recorded.

Leeds: Mill Hill.—The Rev. Nicol Cross's last letter to his congregation, dated October 21, was very short, owing, as he said, to the fact that the infantry to which he and his fellow-workers are attached "are on the track of the retreating Germans," and the conditions of life are consequently very unsettled. He is experiencing the pleasure of witnessing the joy of women and children and old men in the French villages they pass through which have been delivered from the enemy's yoke.

Leicester.—The Great Meeting has sustained a severe loss in the death of Miss Nelly Dexter, a most valued friend and worker. She taught regularly in the boys' school with great success, acted as Secretary of the Band of Hope, and whenever help was needed rendered it to the full, irrespective of whether it was publicly known or not. She was, moreover, a bright comrade in the battle of life, one of the few who are willing to render that sort of constant service upon which alone the Kingdom of God on earth can be built up, and of whom it can be confidently said, "of such is the kingdom of heaven." —The senior boys' school has expressed the greatest appreciation of the immediate response which has been made to their appeal for a new piano. Within a few days practically the whole sum required (£60) was promised, and the new piano has been delivered. A debt of gratitude is due to Mr. Law for his constant energetic services. —Dr. Rattray is among the lecturers at the School for Ministers, Manchester College, Oxford, during the first fortnight of the present month. —At a meeting of the Workers' Council held early in October, a stimulating address was given after business had been dealt with by the Rev. Arnold H. Lewis, of Small Heath, Birmingham, on 'Music, a Spiritual Language.' Musical illustrations were rendered by Miss Clephan and by Miss Louise Martin. As was the intention, these meetings discover those who are willing to give actual help in the church life.

Liverpool: Ullet Road.—In his latest letter to his congregation the Rev. Lawrence Redfern describes some of his experiences in districts recently evacuated by the enemy. The sorrowful sights he saw left a feeling of deep sadness, but this gave way to "a sure and certain hope" born of the belief that the nations are about to unite to put an end to such horrors for ever. He shared in the tumultuous joy which swept through Northern France on the day of the deliverance of Lille when village streets and lanes were bedecked with flags and bunting, and the people gave vent to the feelings natural on such an occasion.

Liverpool: Hope Street.—A General Meeting of the Sunday School Society will be held in Hope Street Church Hall, on Monday, Nov. 11, at 7.30, when the Rev. C. M. Wright, will deliver an address on 'The More Efficient Religious Training of Prospective Sunday School Teachers,' to be followed by discussion. —The meetings in October addressed by Dr. L. P. Jacks and Professor Campagnac, in connection with the Social Problem Circle, were exceedingly well attended and most interesting. Professor Campagnac again made a deep impression on his audience.

London: Mansford Street.—The death is recorded in the Mansford Street Church Calendar of Joseph Slade, killed in action in France on September 7, and Horace Scammell, who died in a hospital in France on October 26.

Manchester: Blackley.—On Sunday evening, October 27, the pulpit was occupied by Miss Francis, of London, who preached to a large congregation.

Mansfield.—The old Meeting House Calendar records that Rifleman Arthur Harrison, of the King's Royal Rifles, was killed in France on September 18, aged 27 years. Private Horace Alfred Brownlow, of the 1/4th Leicester Regiment, died in Neath Hospital on October 7 from wounds received in action, aged 34, and was interred in the Mansfield Cemetery on October 12, when the Rev. T. P. Spedding officiated. Four of his children attend the Old Meeting Sunday School. —Two lectures on the march of the British Army through Palestine will be delivered by the minister, the Rev. T. P. Spedding on Friday, November 8, and Monday, November 25. They will be illustrated by original, selected and official slides, will deal, on the first occasion, with the events culminating in the fall of Jerusalem, and on the second with the recent capture of Damascus. The proceeds from the sale of tickets will be devoted to the Christmas gift for Old Meeting sailors and soldiers. —The meetings of the North Midland Presbyterian and Unitarian Association are postponed until Tuesday, November 19. The religious service at 2.30 will be conducted by the Rev. T. P. Spedding, and Dr. Rattray will be the preacher. —Among those present at the Welcome Meeting on October 14 was A.B. Arthur Whiting who was on board the Otranto when she was wrecked and had a marvellous escape. Opportunity was taken to congratulate him and his parents and to express thanks to God for his deliverance from a great peril.

Norwich.—A marriage was solemnised recently, at the Octagon Chapel, between Mr. J. C. Jewson, son of Alderman George Jewson, J.P., and Miss Annie Ladell, only daughter of Mr. W. N. Ladell, the city coroner, this being the first time that the minister of the church, Miss Margaret B. Crook, has officiated at such a ceremony. Mr. J. C. Jewson is working on an ambulance train in France. Miss Bridget Horne, daughter of the late Rev. C. Silvester Horne, was the bride's attendant.

Nottingham.—On October 20 the Sunday School Anniversary Festival took place at the High Pavement chapel, the Rev. Simon Jones being the preacher. There were good congregations, and most satisfactory collections. On Thursday, October 31, All Hallows Eve, a short evening service was held in commemoration of the dead, both those who had passed over to the other side during the present war and others who had loved and left us on our way through life. It was thought that this particular evening (unstated by custom or ceremonious usage) when, according to old belief, the dead could return to meet their friends on earth, was peculiarly appropriate for such a service. There was a large congregation, including many strangers, and service and address alike made the occasion memorable. The High Pavement hope that other chapels may join with them in days to come in thus celebrating All Hallows Eve.

Oldham.—The Oldham Free Church Ministers' Fraternal has passed a resolution recording its regret at the exclusion of the Unitarians from the Manchester Council of Christian Congregations, and expressing its earnest hope that the interest of the Kingdom of God the Council will speedily reverse its decision, and will welcome all Christians to its fellowship.

Pudsey.—Anniversary Services were held on Sunday, November 3, at the Unitarian Church, the preacher being Miss G. Gibbon Chambers, of Shipley. She took for her subject in the morning, 'This Man or Barabbas?' and in the evening, 'The Dweller in the Innermost,' and also gave an address on 'Flowers' in the afternoon. There were good attendances. Miss Chambers is a member of the congregation, and a very acceptable lay-preacher on the Yorkshire Unitarian plan.

Rochdale.—At the Annual Meeting of the Social Union in connection with the Unitarian Church an excellent report was read. The past year has been, under the circumstances, wonderfully successful; twenty-one new members have been admitted, and the Treasurer has a good balance in hand. Appropriate reference was made to the death of one of the members, Pte. Edmund Shepherd, in action in France a year ago.

Sheffield: Stannington.—Two of the three members on the Underbank Chapel Roll of Honour reported missing, Arnold Vickers and Ernest Grayson, have not yet been heard of, but news has been received that the third, Harry Thorpe, is believed to have died of wounds on the battlefield. Mr. and Mrs. Thorpe have now lost two sons in action. On October 7, Joseph, the son of Mr. and Mrs. Goodison, of Crookes, Sheffield, died of pneumonia, whilst training for the R. Navy at the Crystal Palace, London. He was 18 years of age.

Sheffield: Unity Church.—The Welcome meeting to the Rev. J. Vint Laughland and his wife and family was a great success, and all present were looking to the future in a very hopeful frame of mind. Mr. West made a remark which should be borne in mind by members of congregations not only in Sheffield. He said: "When we welcome a minister we not only make an agreement with him to come to preach to us but there is another side to the bargain, we undertake to be there for him to preach to."

Sheffield: Upper Chapel.—Reference is made in the Monthly Record to the appreciation of the Rev. J. W. Lee's work as Superintendent of the Sunday school which was expressed at a social gathering of the Sunday school teachers in October. The Rev. C. J. Street said that no one could have devoted himself more enthusiastically to the interests of the school than Mr. Lee had done. Wherever help could be rendered, he had given it readily and wholeheartedly. Miss Rogerson also gave expression to the appreciation of the teachers, and asked Mr. Lee, on their behalf, to accept a revolving study chair. Mr. Lee, in reply, spoke of the pleasure he had had in the work of the school and in his association with the teachers. A welcome was accorded to Mr. Hall, the new Superintendent. On this occasion a presentation was also made to 2nd Lieut. C. F. and Mrs. Kerr (formerly Miss L. Harold), two of the teachers who were married a few months ago.

Stalybridge.—The Rev. John Ellis in a letter to his congregation dated October 8, records a pleasant meeting with one of the boys belonging to his church, and a visit to the grave of another upon which he has had a tablet fixed according to instructions. He has been over the ground of his former labours, but the scene is very different now. "Where a few months ago," he says, "were compact villages, busy streets, homesteads, and an active commercial life, all is now devastation and ruin. The Grande Place is filled with the rubbish of what was once a stately Town Hall. The Cathedral is level with the ground. It was a weird experience to walk through the familiar streets and pick out places where once one did business with pleasant shop assistants. In my walk I saw many pathetic pictures of refugees digging amid the ruins of their old homes for bits of furniture and buried treasures.... To-day I have been prospecting for forward work, and my journey took me to within sight of positions at present held by the enemy. By the time you get this these positions may be no longer held by him and as I write I am full of hope that the time of my sojourn amid these horrors may be shorter than I anticipated when I left."—Cpl. G. W. Hadfield, R.F.A., has been awarded the French Medaille Militaire.

THE STORM.

Twelve Sermons preached at Rosslyn Hill Chapel
Hampstead, and Manchester College, Oxford.

BY

Rev. HENRY GOW, B.A.

The sermons are written by one who believes with President Wilson that "right is more precious than peace," and that no personal sorrow or loss should discourage us and turn us from our firm resolve to overthrow the Prussian autocracy. They are written too in the growing confidence that faith in God and in the supremacy of Love has become more and not less possible and real through the conflict and agony of recent times.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

All letters and manuscripts for the Editor should be sent to 13 Bream's Buildings, Fetter Lane, London, E.C.4. They must reach the Editor not later than Wednesday morning for publication the same week.

THE parti-coloured jubilation of the streets at the signing of the armistice has been very natural, and who would grudge their hour of gaiety to a people so long tried by exhausting labours and no less exhausting anxieties? In the attendance of the King and Queen at St. Paul's on Monday and Tuesday multitudes have seen an example they were glad to copy; indeed on Sunday, before the signing took place, there was much confident rejoicing and reverent gratitude. To-morrow's services will surely be very largely attended, for the passing of the first emotions of unutterable relief and a joy unto tears will but leave clearer and stronger the sense of devout thanksgiving.

* * *

In a proclamation issued last week by Prince Max, as Chancellor, to Germans abroad, occurred a sentence the latter part of which has not received so much notice as we should have expected. Most people appear to have noted the words: "The victory for which many hoped has not been granted to us"; the sequel is at least of equal significance, and it may be more—"but the German people has won a greater victory, for it has conquered itself and its belief in the justice of might." If this was sincerely said, and we hope it was, and if it really represents now the thought of that large section of his nation who were brought up on the doctrine of Treitschke and his school, there is hope of a new age for Germany and the world. Whatever mistrust we may feel as to such a momentous conversion, we cannot doubt that the disciples of that school have bitterly learned that in the long run its doctrine does not pay.

bulletins from their military chiefs, the German Socialists have promptly seized their opportunity, and there can be no doubt that the old order is finally gone. In the hour of our own victory we instinctively feel that to triumph overmuch at the fall of the Kaiser and his satellites is not very noble, nor very profitable. Leaving him and them to such fate as awaits them, our interest lies chiefly in the prospects of those millions whose share in their nation's guilt is one thing, but whose evident dangers of famine and strife are another. The humaner policy is so clearly the safer one for all concerned that cordial approval will be given to those far-sighted statesmen, here and across the sea, who are alert to ward off all preventible causes of further anarchy in Central Europe.

THE address given at Birmingham on Tuesday by Lord Robert Cecil, on his installation as Chancellor of the University, is one well worth closest study by all thoughtful people—and, if there are any other people at this time, especially by them. Dealing with the problems of a League of Nations, the address (which is fully reported in Wednesday's Times) frankly admits the immense and all but insuperable difficulties in the way. But Lord Robert wisely points to grounds of hope, such as the increase of broader sympathies in the religious and labour organisations, extending beyond national limits, and to the economic unity of the world now rendered more obvious than formerly.

LORD ROBERT CECIL's closing words are so weighty that we commend them to the attention of any who at this time have the responsibility of moulding the opinions of people around them. He says: "I would add two warnings. In the first place, I do not think that any League of Nations should make us careless of or indifferent about the other terms of peace. Not only is it necessarily an experiment—and we have no right in such vital matters to gamble on the success of any experiment, however promising—but we must have a good peace to give the League a fair start. For any true partnership of nations we must have a territorial settlement based on natural justice; we must re-establish the sanctity of treaties, we must exorcise the spirit of German militarism. Finally, if any new international organisation is to be created, it must be brought into existence by the treaty which shall close this war. The great force on which we must rely is the hatred of the cruelty and waste of war which now exists. Now that the war is over, the process of oblivion will set in. It is only while the recollection of all we have been through is burningly fresh that we can hope to overcome the inevitable opposition and establish at least the beginning of a new and better organisation of the nations of the world."

* * *

THE mingled elements of this our life are brought sadly to mind by the news still coming in of those who have fallen on the very eve of victory—theirs not to gather, here, of the fruits for which they gave their manhood. Close beside us, too, gaps have been made renewing our sense of sorrow in mortal things. At the meeting of the Executive Committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association this week sympathetic references were made to some of these specially affecting its members. Mrs. Sydney Martineau and Mrs. Wooding, who in addition to their other zealous work for our cause have rendered invaluable service to the Lawrence House Hostel, have lost, the former a sister—Mrs. Howard Martineau, the latter a brother—Mr. W. W. Asquith. In addition the whole committee has lost a dear and greatly respected member in Mr. C. F. Pearson, of whom a memoir appears on another page.

* * *

OF Mr. W. W. Asquith, who was the elder brother of the ex-Premier, it is recorded that he fully shared in the family talent, was a conspicuously gifted speaker, a sound scholar, and was urged by Prof. T. H. Green and other friends to devote himself to the ministry. Relinquishing that idea, in 1876 he became Assistant Master at Clifton College, then under Dr. Percival, and there modestly remained—much to the mental and spiritual benefit of generations of pupils. His religious sympathies were broad yet discerning, and in later years he was an occasional worshipper at Rosslyn Hill Chapel, Hampstead.

* * *

WHILE we note the zeal of the authorities in the Church of England to provide properly for the religious well-being of our people, as betokened in an appeal for no less than five millions sterling as sinews of war, we confess we are yet waiting for fuller evidence that, as a whole, the clergy are awake to the real facts of the position. Simply to multiply churches where the old ideas will be presented in the old way appears to be a direct road to failure. When we see how hard it appears to get even the slightest improvements, as they seem to us, introduced into the Order of Common Prayer, we confess we have grave doubts whether millions of money will save the situation. Meanwhile, what are we Unitarians about? The question is urgent in the extreme.

* * *

THE fine list of donations which, as will be seen elsewhere, starts the Sunday School Association's endowment fund shows how sincere is the feeling that among the urgent duties of the present time none is more pressing, none more vital to the well-being of our country, than the upbringing of the children of the land in habits of duty, reverence, and noble thoughtfulness. This is a cause which appeals with special emphasis to many who are not specially eager in other forms of religious activity; they know well that an undisciplined childhood and youth cannot lead to wholesome and upright adult life. Our Association is second to none in the land in the high quality of its publications and the diffusion of wise principles of teaching. We most earnestly commend its claims to prompt and generous support.

THANKSGIVINGS PURE.

LET us give thanks to the Eternal King,
Not in the mood of conquerors whose greed
Or pride has driven men in herds to bleed,
Who boastfully their loud Te Deums sing;
But with the deep and sober thoughts that spring
In men who worked what Destiny decreed,
Whose pure rejoicing flows from nations freed,
A joy which conscience pricks not with its sting.
Britain, thou hast been Heaven's instrument!
An awful thought, which every passion mean,
Vainglory, hate unworthy the event,
Should parch and wither: may thy soul be clean,
Thy gladness unalloyed, and with thy pride
May upward lookings, longings, be allied.

L. GORDON RYLANDS.

NON NOBIS, DOMINE.

NOT unto us, not unto us, be ascribed the glory. It is a glory far too great, too awful, too mysteriously blended of joys and sorrows alike unspeakable. Some part of the suffering and some share of triumphant effort has fallen to us, in our individual and national life. But only the Lord of All Life, who knows all and controls all by His eternal purposes, is equal to this world-shaping event. We mortals are from first to last borne along in the mighty flood, our power of self-direction scanty, our sway over the whole almost negligible. We use such strength as we have as wisely as we may; but our energy, both of body and mind, derives from the Infinite whose everlasting arms are around and beneath us. To Him we humbly bow.

We bow in thankfulness not only for the issue of the conflict but for the inspiration to persist in our duty, as we have perceived it. We would gladly, how gladly, have declined the fearful task and surrendered ourselves to a passive "peace," were it possible. It was not possible. We could no other. Honour be to the brave and cheerful souls who by their self-devotion, at home or in the field, have given new lustre to the name of our nation, to those who endured horrors and pains untold, who indomitably persevered day by day, month by month, through all these terrible years. Honour to the seamen as well as to the soldiers; honour to the toilers as well as to the fighters; honour to the succourers and comforters, to the counsellors who strove to guide our policy aright. Honour and love to the scarred and mutilated who will bear in their body all the rest of their days the marks of this crucifixion for us. Tenderest love, deepest reverence, to those who laid down their lives that we and our liberties might live. And beyond and through all these noble souls we look to the Giver of noble thought, the Sustainer of high resolution, the only Source of wisdom. His be the glory.

We thank God for our unconquerable soul, for the faith in Right that never doubted, however dark the hours might be, for the unfaltering love of Good that counted it far better our dear ones should go from our seeing than that they or we should be false to duty. The light that has broken through the darkness at last may well shine in our faces; it has gone deep down into our hearts. Perilous has been the voyage of our Ship of State, so perilous, and at times so disastrous, that in these swift rushing days we hardly dared to trust the sure gleams that shot through the storm-clouds and heralded the day of Victory. It has come. We have weathered the worst; if not yet quite within the harbour of Peace we are across the bar. Not yet is the time come, not yet could we bear it, to survey critically the havoc made upon us and ours and the world. It has been enormous, frightful. But we have come through; and the Hand that has guided and supported us will be with us still. Be it ours to trust for the tasks of Peace Him who has sustained us in the tasks of War.

GOOD THOUGHTS IN A GOOD TIME.

When the Lord turned again the captivity of Zion, we were like unto them that dream.

Then was our mouth filled with laughter, and our tongue with singing; then said they among the nations, The Lord hath done great things for them.

The Lord hath done great things for us, whereof we are glad.

They that sow in tears shall reap in joy.

My steps had well-nigh slipped, for I was envious at the arrogant, when I saw the prosperity of the wicked.

It was too painful for me, until I went into the sanctuary of God, and considered their latter end.

I have seen the wicked in great power, and spreading himself like a green bay-tree; yet he passed away, and lo, he was not—yea, I sought him, but he could not be found.

Let not the wise man glory in his wisdom, neither let the mighty man glory in his might, nor the rich man in his riches.

But let him that glorieth glory in this, that he knoweth the Lord, who executeth loving-kindness, judgment, and righteousness, in the earth.

The wilderness shall become a fruitful field, judgment shall dwell in the wilderness, and righteousness shall abide in the fruitful field.

And the work of righteousness shall be peace, and the effect of righteousness shall be quietness and confidence for ever.

And my people shall abide in a peaceable habitation, and in sure dwellings, and in quiet resting places.

And the Lord shall judge between many people, and shall reprove strong nations.

And they shall beat their swords into plowshares and their spears into pruning-hooks; nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more.

But they shall sit every man under his own vine and under his fig-tree; and none shall make them afraid.

They shall build houses, and inhabit them; and they shall plant vineyards, and eat the fruit of them.

They shall not build, and another inhabit; they shall not plant, and another eat.

They shall not labour in vain, nor bring forth for calamity.

The Spirit of the Lord God is upon me; because the Lord hath anointed me to preach good tidings to the meek.

He hath sent me to bind up the broken-hearted, to proclaim liberty to the captives and the opening of the prison to them that are bound;

To proclaim the acceptable year of the Lord, and the day of vengeance of our God;

To comfort all that mourn, to give them a garland for ashes, the oil of joy for mourning, the garment of praise for the spirit of heaviness.

They cry unto the Lord in their trouble, and he bringeth them out of their distresses.

He maketh the storm a calm, so that the waves thereof are still.

Then are they glad because they be quiet, so he bringeth them unto their desired haven.

Oh, that men would praise the Lord for his goodness, and for his wonderful works to the children of men!

OUT OF THE VALLEY.

ON no subject probably has there been a greater change of thought during the last fifty years than on Death and its attendant circumstances. The very phrase "King of Terrors," once so familiar, has now lost its meaning for the ordinary educated mind. Death is now seen to be as natural as Life, and its particular incidence here or there depends not upon special Divine decrees but upon the operation of natural causes.

In the 'Varieties of Religious Experience' there are, as far as I can learn from reading and listening and especially from the hymns in general use, three chief types:—

(a) Of those who regard Death as deliverance from an alien world into the secure haven of eternal rest and happiness.

(b) Of those who, lacking this assurance, regard Death with haunting fears and despair.

(c) Of the large number of those who, not concerned with questions of "whence we come" and "whither we go," are wholly absorbed in their life from day to day and care not about anything else. If they have any thought on the subject they keep it to themselves.

I do not wish to suggest that there is any want of sincerity in those belonging to (a) and (b), but I do think there is a want of reality, a clinging to Tradition long after it has lost the vitality it once possessed. This has always been one of the greatest hindrances to true religion, which has suffered more from faithless friends than from open enemies. No doubt our thoughts on this question are largely determined by what we have been accustomed to think on related questions.

I myself am a Unitarian, born and bred, and have often had occasion to feel thankful for a faith which not only ministers to a sense of human need (especially in its stress upon the love of God) but also stiffens human effort. The double conviction that the Present grows out of the Past, that both go to determine the Future, and that in time and eternity men must reap as they have sown, is an immense support to all who are striving "to fight the good fight."

And now this faith has just been put to a fresh test. I have had a severe illness, and I suppose no one could get nearer to "the Great Divide" without crossing the line altogether. I was not told when I was at the worst, but I knew pretty well how matters stood. Though I was extremely weak, my mind was clear and I was quite conscious. I had no visions. The phrase kept recurring "it doth not yet appear what we shall be." And I had not a moment's fear, for I felt that I was in the hands of God, and where could I be more secure? I was ready for either event and yet I wished to recover, for I have found life full of interests, sometimes sad and anxious, sometimes joyous, but always interesting, always worth while. Then, too, I love my family and friends whom I did not wish to leave.

There was another special reason. For more than four years we have lived through the agony of this terrible war. I have never lost faith as to the ultimate issue. But there have been many dark periods, during which we heard almost daily of precious lives one had known more or less being spilled like water on the ground, as it seemed, in vain. Then came a sudden turn in the tide. At last, as I lay in great weakness, news came day by day that God once again was vindicating His supremacy, and that, through the marvellous bravery of our sailors and soldiers, He was redeeming the world from German Hell, which means "the negation of God" and of everything worth living for. Under these circumstances, who that had a spark of spirit in him would not wish to live a little longer that he might do his "bit?"

I am one of those for whom the Life Beyond has always been more than a great "perhaps" or a mere inference. Yet I am not a "Spiritualist"; I have had no "manifestations" or "communications." I can only appeal to "the evidence of things not seen," which for those who do not accept it must, of course, fall short of certainty. I have had it laid upon me in a quite special way to bear this testimony in fewest and simplest words to a genuine and (for me) unique experience. Sooner or later we must all face death, and face it alone. Perhaps this testimony may help some (and has not the war taught us to help each other?) to meet a similar crisis with cheerful trust, and also comfort others, who naturally strive to picture to themselves the last thoughts of their beloved ones who have died at the front. MEMORIAL NOTICES.

CHARLES FELLOWS PEARSON.

IN the death of Mr. C. F. Pearson at Hampstead on November 6, our religious community has lost one of its leading laymen, a man respected and beloved by all who knew him. Charles Fellows Pearson was born in London, January 18, 1844. He was the youngest child of Michael and Maria Pearson, and was named after his mother's brother, Sir Charles Fellows. His first school was at Hampstead, where he had as companions Mr. Sutton Sharpe and other Unitarian boys. Afterwards, he went to school at Worksop; and then for a year or more he attended classes at University College, London, and at University Hall, about the period when Dr. Carpenter, Dr. Wicksteed, Mr. G. W. Brown, and Mr. Grosvenor Talbot were students.

In early manhood he became a teacher at Little Portland St. Sunday School; and during the ministry of the Rev. P. W. Clayden he was superintendent of the Sunday school at Kentish Town. In 1875 he was married to Miss Lily Williams at the Free Christian Church, Clarence Road. For many years he was treasurer of the Carter Lane Mission and of its successor the Blackfriars Mission; his personal interest and sympathy and his generous financial assistance were an unfailing encouragement to these engaged in the work. The list of institutions which Mr. Pearson served with devotion and zeal is a remarkable one. He was a member of the Committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association; he occupied the honoured position of President in 1905-6; and during the past five years he contributed £100 a year to its funds. He served the Sunday School Association as a member of Committee, Chairman, and President. Along with Mr. Frederick Nettlefold, Mr. Edwin Lawrence, Mr. W. Arthur Sharpe, Mr. S. S. Tayler, and Mr. I. M. Wade he took an active part in securing Essex Hall as a central building for the denomination and he was one of the first list of trustees. A Hibbert Trustee, a member of the Presbyterian Board, a Trustee of Dr. Williams' Library, for a time a Director of THE INQUIRER, a member of the Council of University College School and Hospital, the Aged and Infirm Protestant Ministers Fund, the Hampstead Hospital, the Invalid Children's Aid Association, the Cripplegate School and the Ladies Charity School, he was also a Past Master of the Drapers Company in the City of London.

When the Hampstead Soldiers and Sailors Family Association was formed, Mr. Pearson at once volunteered his help. The Association afterwards became the War Pensions Committee of which he was the Treasurer and Chairman. To this work he gave the most unwearied and painstaking attention, frequently spending long and laborious hours at the Town Hall. Peace has had its martyrs as well as war; and if Mr. Pearson had cared only for his own health, he might have been living to-day; but he preferred toil to ease; service for others to self-protection.

A convinced and zealous liberal in politics, education, and religion, his name appeared in countless subscription lists. His support of all kinds of benevolent work was usually bestowed unsought. He seemed always to be looking for opportunities of helpfulness; and his gifts were made with such simplicity and cheerfulness of spirit, that the recipients were made to feel that they were conferring a benefit instead of receiving one.

Mr. C. F. Pearson was one of the few laymen whom I have known who talked about religion in a plain unaffected way. Religion was an integral part of his thought and life. In the early days of Dr. Her-ford's ministry at Hampstead, I made a remark about his regular attendance at the Sunday services, to which he replied that the worship and the sermon did him good for the rest of the week. He was not a student, but he was a lover and reader of books, especially religious books of a broad and reverent type. All sincere and good men have their antipathies; and Mr. Pearson had strong antipathies. He intensely disliked priestcraft, Roman and Anglican; the priest was to him the arch enemy of civil and religious freedom, and his interposition was a menace to the human soul in worshipping God in spirit and in truth. The Altar in the Household was never neglected. Prayer was to him perfectly simple and natural. He possessed a strong and tender reverence for the life and teaching of the human Jesus; but he had no interest in the theological Christ; and semi-orthodox phrases used by some Unitarians awakened no response in his mind or heart. This conviction drew him for a time to the Theistic Church, where the form of worship greatly interested and influenced him. At Hampstead he was happy in his associations of personal friendship with the ministers, and in the Chapel worship. At the time of his death he was Chairman of the Rosslyn Hill Chapel Committee.

It was characteristic of Mr. Pearson, as of the best type of Englishman, that he possessed a deep and constant love of his own home. The happiness, the mutual confidence, the solicitous care for the amenities of the household, were an un-failing joy to him all through life. His widow, his three sons, and two daughters, who survive him, look back with deepest gratitude upon his home life; and it will remain to them a beautiful and inspiring memory.

Mr. Pearson was a man without pretension, void of all personal ambition, who in business, and in public and private life, was faithful to his ideals, generous of his time and means, ready and eager to be of service. He had none of the art of a speaker who on occasion can deftly conceal his thoughts; he always spoke in plain, manly, straightforward words. Above all, he was inspired by a faith in God which a world-tragedy could not shake, and a love for man which no hymn of hate could quench. I first became acquainted with Mr. C. F. Pearson in the autumn of 1880; and for thirty-eight years our intercourse and friendship remained unbroken.

FUNERAL SERVICE.

There was a large attendance at Rosslyn Hill Chapel, Hampstead, on Saturday, November 9, at the Funeral Service previous to cremation at Golders' Green. The service was conducted by the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie and the Rev. Henry Gow. An address commemorative of the life and labours of Mr. C. F. Pearson was delivered by Mr. Gow.

CAPTAIN A. B. PRITCHARD.

WE deeply regret to record the death of Captain Andrew Baden Pritchard, Staffordshire Yeomanry, who died in Palestine of malaria on October 26. He was born in 1882, a son of the late Henry Pritchard; his brother, Mr. Gibbon Pritchard, is well-known in connection with the congregation now meeting at University Hall, London, and many relatives are associated with Stoke Newington Green.

Captain Pritchard had served in the Egyptian and Palestine expeditions and took part in the recent memorable cavalry advance which led to the surrender of the Turkish forces in North Palestine. We are favoured with sight of his last letter to his sister, dated September 22, in which he said:—

"When I wrote last we were moving up to the kicking-off place and were at a place called Yebus. That was on Monday. All our trekking had to be done at night so that the enemy could not get wind of all the cavalry coming up that way. We did 10 miles to Ramleh that night, starting at 6.30 and getting in at 10.30, and camped in a very nice olive grove outside the town. The next days we had the plans of the stunt issued to us, which sounded then quite impossible. Off again at 8 p.m., and did 14 miles to the kicking-off place (near Jaffa,) getting in at 1 a.m. This was a camouflaged area, all the horses being hidden in orange groves all day, and no horses moved except at certain times for watering, when our aeroplanes were up to prevent any Hun planes getting near enough to see the dust raised. We lay in the orange groves all day—they were perfectly lovely, but the oranges not quite ripe enough for eating—and got some sleep from 8 p.m. to 2 a.m. The bombardment started just before dawn on Thursday morning, and we moved up while the infantry were making the gap. It was quite a tame affair going through and we pushed on 30 miles before we halted for water. Got there about 6 in the evening, and moved off again at 9. Marched all night through the hills, and got to the end of the pass just at dawn, and there was a bit of a scrap with a few Turks who were coming up to stop us, but they were too late. We stopped to water, and then on to a fair-sized German colony in the valley, which we reached about 9 a.m. on Friday morning after doing another 30 miles. There was a lot of stuff all over the place, and four aeroplanes were captured at an aerodrome, several motor lorries, and a good bit of stores. We had an hour for breakfast, and then our squadron had to go out and do outpost work. We had a good view of Mount Tabor and Nazareth, which looked nice up in the hills. Left again at 1.30, and did the last 18 miles in five hours without any opposition." After describing the streaming in of prisoners in numbers so large as to be difficult to cope with, he speaks of the grand view they had of the Jordan valley, and ends with the words, now pathetic to read—"I am very fit."

CAPTAIN H. L. EVERS.

WE deeply regret to record the death of Captain Hugh Lancelot Evers, Worcester Regiment, who was killed in action on November 1, aged 37. He was the sixth son of the late Frank Evers and Mrs. Evers, of White Hall, Stourbridge. Educated at Park Gate, Cheshire, and Rugby School, he was an engineer by profession. On formation of the 2/8th Worcester Regiment he joined up as a private on September 24, 1914, and was given his commission on November 27 following. His battalion went to France on May 24, 1916, and he was severely wounded near St. Julien on August 27, 1917. He rejoined his regiment at the front last June. He was awarded the Military Cross for his leading of his company on August 27, 1917, and a bar to the M.C. for good work during operations between September 3 and 5, 1918.

WE have received a note from Lieut.-Colonel Bullock requesting us to ask our people if any of them would care to open their homes to take in an Overseas soldier for Christmas, December 24 to 27 or 28. Here is a practical way to show our appreciation of what the lads from the United States and Canada have done. If any reader can and will take one of these lads in for Christmas, please send name and address with particulars to the Secretary, Essex Hall, Essex Street, W.C.2. Invitations must be in hand by the last day of this month.

CORRESPONDENCE.

ASSOCIATION SUNDAY.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—May I, as Treasurer of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, be allowed to remind your readers that the Annual Congregational Collections will be taken on Sunday, November 17, unless another date has been found more convenient. Association Sunday affords a useful opportunity for calling attention to the missionary work of the denomination, and the need for its development and extension at home and abroad. The Committee rely on the sympathy and support of the members of our congregations in carrying on the important work which has been entrusted to them.—Yours, &c. GEORGE W. BROWN, Treasurer.

THE FLORENCE NIGHTINGALE CONVALESCENT HOME FOR MEN.

A SUGGESTED THANK-OFFERING.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—There will be widespread rejoicing at the cessation of hostilities and a general desire to express our gratitude to the men whose incomparable valour has achieved this end. May we crave space to call attention to the Florence Nightingale Home for Soldiers, Sailors, and other men of our community which has been established by our Sunday School Associations as a National War Memorial for our men.

The Home is, at present, established in temporary premises at Great Hucklow, near Buxton, and soldiers from our schools in London and elsewhere have already stayed there. As soon, however, as it is possible it is hoped to erect premises which may more adequately express our feelings of admiration and regard. A Convalescent Home for Men was decided upon as the form of the Memorial because, while it would meet a present urgent need, it would also have a future career of great usefulness in the life of our schools and congregations. The Authorities have replied to our inquiry that while they can provide fees, they desire to avoid the erection of buildings, and, therefore they warmly welcome our proposal. A beginning has been made in the raising of the necessary funds and about £2,000 has been promised—mainly in the Manchester area.

An appeal will, in due course, be made to the whole of our community, but in the meantime may we say how gladly and gratefully we shall welcome contributions. The total sum aimed at is £10,000, of which not less than one half will be set aside as an endowment. Lord Doverdale has generously headed the list with a gift of £500, and others have followed with substantial sums. If every reader of this letter will send us a contribution as a thank-offering for the cessation of hostilities, and if church committees and ministers will, where possible, arrange for collections at their Thanksgiving Services it will be an enormous help and encouragement to the Committee who have the matter in hand. The treasurer is Mr. T. Fletcher Robinson, 117, Claremont Road, Pendleton, Manchester.—Yours, &c.,

HUGH J. BROADBENT,
Chairman.

SERBIAN RECONSTRUCTION.

THE object of the Society for Training Serbian Women is to help them take their part in the reconstruction of their country. The enemy desired to exterminate the people, and has so far succeeded that the number of men to carry on the work of the nation will be not only comparatively, but actually, very small and quite inadequate; the women must, therefore, take a large share in such work. By training the women and girls we give Serbia the opportunity of reconstructing herself, by means of her own people, on the lines which she finds best suited to her needs.

To this end it is essential that we should give the girls the best training which is in our power, not in book-learning merely but in the training of character. Many schools have very generously opened their doors to Serbian girls, and their education is thus assured. But for the development of character the vital need is a home, where the little waif of the war can love and be loved, and can enjoy the freedom and happiness of family life. Such a home would always be a memory of happiness, and would have a steadying influence on a life which will necessarily be passed in a country where every person has suffered, or has seen, horrors that surpass even those of Belgium.

The Society's scheme is so to use patriotic feeling and national aspirations that a whole people may benefit. These girls, so far from being de-nationalised, will have the ideal of their country always before them; their language and their religion must never be forgotten; they will come to us as patriotic Serbs, and they will leave us, we hope, even more fervently imbued with that passionate love of their country which has always been one of the glories of Serbia. They will be scattered throughout Serbia as teachers, as doctors, as nurses, as workers in every field of knowledge. Their training in all branches of medical work will save thousands of infant lives for their country, their training in other professions and occupations will keep the economic life of Serbia in Serbian hands, and the training of their characters will have an uplifting and ennobling effect upon the whole nation; for these girls will have, as mothers and teachers, the up-bringing and education of the next generation.

Those of our readers who desire to help, or to learn more about this admirable work should write to the hon. secretary, Miss M. A. Murray, 16 Somerset Terrace, Duke's Road, W.C.1.

THE 'Strength of Britain Movement' (175 Piccadilly, W.1.) issues useful notes for preachers and other speakers on temperance reforms. We warmly commend the aims of this organisation to the support of all good citizens, and of religious people especially.

At the impressive service in St. Margaret's Church, Westminster, on October 27, in memory of Sir Walter Raleigh, the beautiful lines which were found in his Bible in the Gate House, Palace Yard, it is said, after his execution, and which are supposed to have been written the night before, were sung (music by Tallis, 1520-85). They are as follows:—

Even such is Time who takes in trust
Our youth, our joys, and all we have,
And pays us but with earth and dust;
Who, in the dark and silent grave,
When we have wandered all our ways,
Shuts up the story of our days.
But from that earth, that grass, and dust,
The Lord shall raise me up, I trust.

THE DICKENS CIRCLE.

THE Rev. Clement E. Pike writes: "A volume by Mr. J. W. T. Ley on 'The Dickens Circle: a Narrative of the Novelist's Friendships' has a special interest for Unitarians, because, for one reason, one of the firmest of the friends was the Rev. Edward Tagart, the minister of Little Portland Street Unitarian Chapel. Judging from a review of the book in The British Weekly it appears evident that this fact has not been obscured as in some previous publications. The curious tendency to abbreviate the term of Dickens' connection with the Unitarian chapel was pointed out by the present writer in 'THE INQUIRER' a dozen years ago. Forster stated it as "two or three years," the Dictionary of National Biography translated this into a year or two, and Mr. G. K. Chesterton knocked off the years of the last statement and substituted weeks—"for a week or two he went to a Unitarian chapel; in a week or two he returned." It is satisfactory to know that the tide of misstatement appears to have spent itself, and indeed the force of nature could hardly further go than in Mr. Chesterton's verdict. The following comment in The British Weekly errs, if anything, on the side of brevity in describing the term as of three or four years; but it is an improvement, and its tribute to the work and warmth of Mr. Tagart's friendship with the great novelist is true, and due. 'The Rev. Edward Tagart, minister of the Little Portland Street Unitarian Chapel, in which for three or four years Dickens had sittings, was a very warm friend. He was a solid good man, for whose character and intellect Dickens had a high esteem. There is sufficient documentary evidence to show that Dickens was to the end a Unitarian.'

ACCORDING to recent information received from Dr. Marrable, of the Church Missionary Society, the internal condition of Persia is deplorable and the sufferings of the people almost beyond description. Accounts arriving from other sources bear out his statements, and it is feared that unless further means of helping the inhabitants to withstand the ravages of famine are forthcoming, thousands must perish. In the Ispahan district alone some 50,000 natives are said to have "absolutely nothing to eat but a coarse kind of grass and leaves of trees."

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Chester.—The 218th anniversary of the founding of Matthew Henry's Chapel will be celebrated to-morrow (Sunday, November 17), the preacher for the day being the Rev. Arthur H. Coar of Holyoke, Mass., U.S.A., one of the American visitors at present in this country.

Deptford.—Many friends will regret to hear of the death on October 29, of Mrs. Marchant, widow of the late Rev. A. J. Marchant, with whom she was an indefatigable worker among the poor connected with this ancient congregation. Mrs. Marchant, who had been living at Peckham, died at her son's at Upper Tooting.

Hull.—Home Fires for November is full of news items and cheery words for the boys at the front, who are now reaping the reward of their bravery and endurance. There are, as usual, several extracts from letters received from men in France and elsewhere.

Hunslet.—The Unitarian congregation at Hunslet was founded in 1865 by the Rev. Thomas Hincks and members of Mill Hill Chapel. In 1868 a building was erected. The Church is this year celebrating its jubilee. A fund is being raised to strengthen the position financially, and a week of meetings has just been concluded for the quickening of enthusiasm and the thankful commemoration of past blessings. On Sunday evening, October 27, the Rev. E. Gwilym Evans preached, and made a stirring appeal for a more faithful following of Christ. On Tuesday and Thursday evenings, the 29th and 31st, evening services were conducted by Dr. S. F. Dufton, a member, and the Rev. A. Leslie Smith, the minister of the Church. Mr. Thomas Thornton and his daughter, Miss Phyllis Thornton, played the violincello and violin, and Mr. John Thornton was at the organ. On Saturday, November 2, there was a congregational gathering in the school. The Rev. Dendy Agate, the second minister of the church (1875 to 1878) on this Saturday evening gave an interesting lecture in which he spoke of the foundation and history of the church, its past workers, and its relation to religion to-day. Mr. Prescott, an old member, had prepared a large number of slides from photographs, and with his lantern showed portraits of past and present members of the congregation, ministers, and other friends. Mr. Paul Woffindin presided. Speeches were also made by the Rev. A. Leslie Smith, Mr. James Woffindin (secretary), Dr. Dufton, and others. Mr. Agate also preached the next evening in the church to a large congregation. Members of Mill Hill Chapel and Holbeck Church and old members of the Hunslet Church, now living at a distance, attended the different meetings. Letters were received from Mrs. T. R. Elliott and Mrs. John Fox, and the former ministers, the Rev. H. McLachlan and the Rev. F. Coleman. The well-trained choir rendered great assistance. The Jubilee week has been inspiring and encouraging.

London: Hampstead.—The Rev. H. Gow has been urgently pressed to return to Havre for a further period of four months with the Y.M.C.A., and the committee of Rosslyn Hill Chapel have granted him leave of absence. The need of workers for the Y.M.C.A. is very pressing, and now that hostilities have ceased the demands on their services will be even greater than before. Mr. Gow expects to return to France early in the New Year. He hopes to preach on all Sunday evenings in November and December, and all Sunday mornings except December 1, and will conduct the usual service on Christmas Day. A Service of Thanksgiving was held at Rosslyn Hill Chapel at 6.30 P.M. on Monday evening, November 11, and was largely attended. The National Anthem was sung and the Hallelujah Chorus played at the close.—Owing to the need of economy in coal the Quiet Hour for reading and silent worship has been discontinued, but it is hoped that it will be resumed in April. These Saturday afternoon meetings have been deeply appreciated by those who have attended and much gratitude is felt towards Mr. R. Howgrave Graham who initiated them and carried them through.—Deep regret is expressed at the death at sea on October 4 of Mr. Roland E. Johns, who was returning to India when the vessel in which he sailed was torpedoed off the Irish Coast and he went down with it. It is characteristic of him that when his friends heard that his ship was sunk they had little hope of his safety. They all knew he would be among the last to leave and that he would be helping others to escape. He was one of the most unselfish, considerate, generous, loving and loveable of men, and his many friends will remember him always with reverence and affection.

London: Kilburn.—Last year a sum of £106 was raised towards clearing off the debt in connection with the Unitarian Church. Further expense which was not anticipated has been incurred by necessary repairs to the heating apparatus, and about £100 is now required in order to get rid of the debt and put the church into a position to provide ordinary income. Towards this amount £30 has already been subscribed by members of the church. A sale of work will be held on December 5, and donations and gifts may be sent to the Rev. J. Arthur Pearson, 4, Ella Road, Crouch Hill, N.8. The church has suffered with others from the effects of the war, and is in the midst of hard times, but it "carries on" with spirit and tries to avoid the slackening of any of its efforts to be of real use as an educational and religious centre. The Sunday school has doubled its numbers in the last two years, the Girls' Clubs have a membership of fifty-five, and it is hoped shortly to resume the work of the Boys' Club.

London: Mansford Street.—The fifty-first Annual Meeting of past and present scholars, teachers and workers of Spicer Street, and Mansford Street Church and Mission, Bethnal Green, was held on Saturday last, November 9, and was well attended. A short programme of music was arranged by Miss Edith Block. On Monday evening, November 11, a Thanksgiving Service was held in the church, conducted by the Rev. Gordon Cooper.

Reading.—On Sunday last, on the invitation of Mr. S. Hayward, the new mayor, the Corporation attended the service at the Unitarian Free Church, when an eloquent sermon was preached by Dr. J. Estlin Carpenter. It was naturally on the subject which engrosses all minds to-day—namely, the fall of that evil system of fraud and rapine which was personified in the ex-Kaiser, who in seeking to be a world-despot brought about his own doom and the wreck of his own Empire. The energies of the civilised world have been severely taxed to destroy the terrible pest; and new problems equally grave, vast and difficult are awaiting solution. We have not only to build up the old waste places and repair the ravages of a ruthless foe, but to make the fabric of civilisation more beautiful than before.

Southampton.—During October the services at the Church of the Saviour were held in the afternoon, in order to save lighting, but it was found necessary to have the electric lights turned on, so no economy was affected, and as people evidently prefer them it has been decided to resume Evening Services.

Wallasey.—At the Annual Meeting of the "Governing Body" of the Memorial Church a special resolution of appreciation of the labours and sermons of the minister, the Rev. A. Ernest Parry, was carried unanimously. In response the latter referred to the excellent work which is being accomplished in the Sunday school and to the unflagging devotion of the teachers. On November 10 Mr. Parry began a series of Sunday evening lectures on 'Reconstruction in Religion.'

SERVICES of gratitude were held at many of our churches on Monday evening.

THE Relief Committee of the Society of Friends is continuing its good work in Russia, and Mr. E. St. John Catchpool, one of the members, in a letter received a week or two ago from Moscow—where a large part of the population are faced with appalling prospects as the winter comes on—says: "I am still busily engaged upon the bread scheme (to bring flour by barge from the province of Samara, where the Friends' mission has the confidence of the authorities). I hope I can pull it through. I believe that our organisation is the only one to do it, because we have the respect of the Bolsheviks and the confidence of the Czecho-Slovaks. We have promised to try to bring through 40,000 Russian pounds on the understanding that it is to be used solely for children up to the age of 14."

DEATHS.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION.

APPEAL FOR FINANCIAL SUPPORT.

THIS Association, founded in the year 1833, has always held an honoured place in our religious community. Its objects are the promotion of religious education in our Sunday Schools, Churches, and Homes throughout the British Isles and Overseas; and the publication of suitable books for teachers and young people.

Upon the strength of the Sunday School and the permanent attachment of scholars—past and present—the future of many of our Churches very largely depends.

One outcome of the War will be a deepening of the religious thought and life of the nation; and there can be no better contribution than supplying our young people with the best available literature, and encourage in every possible way their moral and religious development.

The Association, with its long and wide experience, is able and anxious to extend the work of religious education, provided it can rely upon a much larger source of income. It is out of the question to undertake fresh obligations on the present income from subscriptions of about £250 a year.

The Committee has, therefore, decided to raise an endowment Fund. The confidence shown in the Association is seen in the list of substantial donations privately collected, amounting to £3,500. It is hoped that a further sum of at least £3,500 will result from this public appeal.

All monies received under this head will be invested as a Capital Fund in the names of Trustees, and the income applied for the work of the Association. If preferred, gifts may take the form of War Stock, National War Bonds, or other Government Loans.

Those who do not see their way to contribute to the Endowment Fund may assist the Association by becoming annual subscribers, or by increasing their present subscriptions. Donations and promises of support should be sent to MR. HAROLD WADE, Hon. Treasurer, at Essex Hall.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE King's activities since the signing of the armistice have elicited warm approval, and nonconformists are naturally greatly pleased that His Majesty attended the great service held by them at Albert Hall. We fear the stricter sort of Churchmen will not be so gratified; but if ever there was a time when sectarian barriers should fall it is just now. As to the royal speech to Parliament on our victory, a question that often arises may possibly recur, and people may wonder just how much of it is due to the royal pen. We all like to believe that the King had a large share in its composition, and we have not the slightest doubt that its expressions of devout thankfulness and its tributes to those who have wrought for victory are in full accord with his feelings at this moment. It is not the British style to emulate the adulations which have led the way to monarchical disasters all around us; we are at the same time probably the loyalest of peoples in Europe.

It is reported that Dr. Deissmann, "the German scientist"—no doubt the theologian is meant—has written to the Archbishop of Canterbury urging him to use his influence so to shape peace terms as to prevent sowing the seeds of a future conflict. That the Archbishop will in any case do what he can to secure a wise and just settlement we have no doubt whatever; but we confess that these appeals by Germans do not move our sympathy. Did Dr. Deissmann, whose visit before the war in the interests of international amity we well remember, or did any important group of German theologians, make appeal to the Kaiser and his advisers in the course of the war to refrain from the horrible deeds which have rendered their national reputation abominable to mankind? They may have done so, but the world seems not to have heard of it. As for Dr. Sol's protest that the Rhineland people must starve if the terms of the armistice are carried out—well, if Mr. Hoover reported truly there is no immediate danger, and he ought to know.

MEANWHILE, in the very hour when one would think policy and humane feelings would concur in treating decently the liberated prisoners, we receive apparently too well authenticated reports of barbarities simply appalling. We are glad to see that whatever Government there is in Berlin has been emphatically reminded of its full responsibility for these and any similar outrages, and we hope that the criminals actually guilty of them will be drastically dealt with if possible. It really seems as if there is an element in the blood of the nation which has no affinity with ordinary human nature—a wild-beasthood that must be tamed.

THE impossibility, which is confessed, of getting any adequate vote from the men abroad is a most serious feature in the position caused by the dissolution of Parliament and the ensuing political contest. Apart from this particular point, a great many people, we believe, are deeply ashamed that on the morrow of the nation's victory, when all that is worthiest in the nation's mind and heart has been summoned by an experience too great for words, we should have the air filled with the rival shouts of politicians "on the make." But the certainty that so large and so manifestly important a portion of the electorate will be practically disfranchised is not merely a disabling thing, it is fraught with very serious dangers. The die being cast, sensible people will of course make the best of the situation, and see that such influence as they have is wisely employed. Decent men and women cannot afford to stand aloof and leave the arena to the exploiters.

THE tasks of those who are in any sense religious teachers just now are fully as urgent as at any time during the war period. Labour troubles are evidently threatening, due in part to the inevitable falling off in employment on munition work, but also to a long-suppressed ferment under abnormal restrictions. All the people's moderation and generosity of temper will be needed if we are to escape serious mischief; and to foster these is the immediate duty of the wise. And we should all make a point of complying with the appeal of the League of Nations Union to make December 22, the old Peace Sunday, the occasion of educative and uplifting services on behalf of the League of Nations idea. In such a work our Churches should be foremost.

SINCE we made the recent appeal for a special effort on behalf of our Belgian Hospital Fund, the response to which has been most gratifying, the circumstances have so marvellously changed that we are now able to invite our readers to an effort which is not only to be special but final. Mrs. Bernard Allen, with whose opinion the Rev. W. H. Drummond agrees, writes to say that, if we can now get as substantial help by donations as we confidently hope, the Fund may fitly close with the 200th weekly list, which, as we pointed out, will be published in Christmas week. Will our good friends, therefore, kindly bear this in mind, and let us have a crowning token of their goodwill and sympathy for the gallant little nation which has suffered so much and is now triumphing so signally.

THE head of the Belgian Medical Service has written to Mrs. Allen expressing the hope that a permanent monument may be set up in Belgium recording the invaluable help rendered by our Belgian Hospital Fund. His suggestion is that some prominent "piece of work" should be established in connection with one of the hospitals for the permanently disabled, which will be moved to Belgian soil as soon as possible. Now, we are sure no one would wish the impoverished Belgians to be put to the cost of such a monument, though they would certainly pinch themselves to show their gratitude in this matter. If our closing lists are as generous as we anticipate, we believe the modest expense necessary can be covered without trou-ling them to do more than frame the record as they may deem right.

WE referred recently to the late Dr. A. D. White's book, 'The Warfare of Science with Theology.' It is interesting to note that this work grew during many years; that, unlike Prof. J. W. Draper, the author did not regard science as in conflict with religion, but with dogmatic theology; and that the kernel of the work may be found in the following thesis of an early lecture: "In all modern history, interference with science in the supposed interest of religion, no matter how conscientious such interference may have been, has resulted in the direst evil both to religion and to science, and invariably; and, on the other hand, all untrammelled scientific investigation, no matter how dangerous to religion some of its stages may have seemed for the time to be, has invariably resulted in the highest good both of religion and of science."

DR. WHITE's successive chapters bring together an immense wealth of illustration of ecclesiastical teachings respecting the universe and creation, geography, astronomy, miracles, genesis of man, the "Fall," demonology, magic, &c., with the scientific advance, on the contrary, in the fields of geology, chemistry, physiology, hygiene, pathology, and so on, finishing with the victory of the "higher criticism." A score of years during which the book has been widely circulated, not only in English, but in French, Italian, German, and Spanish, may have left something of a gap between the author's foremost frontiers of science and their present position, but substantially the work remains as useful as ever to the student who will but "verify his references." The author's conviction was that, "although theological control will continue to diminish, Religion, as seen in the recognition of 'a Power in the universe,' not ourselves, 'which makes for righteousness,' and in the love of God and of our neighbour will steadily grow stronger and stronger.... in the world at large. Thus," he added, "may the declaration of Micah as to the requirements of Jehovah, the definition by St. James of 'pure religion and undefiled,' and, above all, the precepts and ideals of the blessed Founder of Christianity himself, be brought to bear more and more effectively on mankind."

WRITING on behalf of the London District Unitarian Society, the Rev. J. Arthur Pearson says: "Thanks to the courtesy and consideration of the Rev. Dr. de la Faille and his Consistory arrangements have been made for a United Service of Thanksgiving on December 1, at the Dutch Church, Austin Friars, Old Broad Street, at 7 P.M. The preacher will be the Rev. Henry Gow, B.A., of Hampstead. It may be remembered that the last United Service was indefinitely postponed owing to the darkened streets and the possibility of air-raids. It is hoped that the ancient church, the refuge of many of the independent thinkers of the Continent in the old days, may once again be filled by a large congregation."

DEAR LIFE.

THERE are some things dearer than life, yet life itself is very dear. And behind and below all the outstanding aspects of the world-event which it has been our blessed privilege to witness, there is in many a heart one secret happy thought—"He is alive." The Father, Husband, Son, Brother, Lover, Friend, counts sometimes for more than all the rest of the world. We are good citizens, we hope, but our own are our own. There is no need to tell each other how the burden has lain heavy upon us, day and night, and how we just lived on from morning to morning, dreading the news that might come. In many, many cases it did come. The flags are now hanging out, and the thanksgivings abound, but the full tale of the dead is only now made public. "We must not call them dead, who pass away," the hymn says, and a great Voice speaks across the ages: "All souls live unto God." Our Amens to that are sincere, it is our one comfort. But their life is "hidden," and it is our natural human way to want to see the beloved ones and to grasp their hand.

So, with profoundest relief and thanks, we say: "He is alive; he has come through; he will, all being well, come back." What a happy vision arises of the myriad home-comings! Words will fail, we know; but the joy will not be unexpressed. In a score of ways—large hospitality, beautiful surroundings, music and dancing—all symbols that speak delight will find their place. And the welcomes will assuredly extend far beyond the family circle, into fellowships of all kinds, serious and sportive, in workplaces, clubs, schools, institutes, colleges, churches. Dear life will approve itself dearer than ever.

There is much speculation as to "what the men will do" when they return. Judging by the hints we have gathered from some of them, they have no very definite plans, no very clear schemes either of thought or action. By and by, they may work something out; but just now they want simply to feel the joy of being alive. Each according to his range wants to get paid back some of his arrears in what Browning calls "the mere living." Probably some forms of repayment contemplated are not so altogether wise as we elder stay-at-homes might desire; but repayment in some kind is amply due after all they have done and borne. We should like them to have a full banquet of beauty. War is always ugly, but this war has been ugliest of all, as ugly as the sin that conceived it. To the end of their days, we suspect, some of these lads will have recurring dreams of the mud and the stench and the blood and the indescribable ruin they have been through. Next year, please God, they must have plenty of flowers and England's sweetest grace. They must be wooed back to the healthy happiness that has made in past centuries for English sanity, humour, moderation, kindly manhood under whatever brusque reserve. The old catechism makers were not wrong, we maintain, when they taught the young to believe that the chief end of man is "to glorify God and enjoy Him for ever." We all want our beloved brethren and sons to do that, in all sound, sensible, and abounding fulness and depth. It is the business of those who profess a manly religion to show them how this is not only possible but supremely right; and, like Goldsmith's parson, to allure to this real heaven, and "lead the way."

TO YOUNG MEN AND WOMEN.

BY THE REV. ALFRED HALL, M.A.

IN trying to make clear 'What Unitarians have to offer our Young Men and Women concerning Life and Religion,' I recall a remark made to me by a University student after a visit to the Christian Student Movement at Swanwick. It was to this effect: "Church people seem to have a great deal more religious fervour than we have as a whole. They can't reason things out but they know: they are absolutely certain of their religious convictions and can't help worshipping Christ. Well, I don't feel that myself. What's wrong with me? There are times when I doubt even the existence of God. What is He and how does He work? He seems an awful way off at times, and yet to people who believe in the deity of Christ, that seems to bring Him nearer."

These words, with the rest of the letter, are a soul's cry "for God, for the living God," so common with young people who are made of the right stuff,—just the kind of young people we need to win to the allegiance and service of our great cause.

"Church people can't reason things out, but they know." No doubt, we move others deeply, and may carry conviction to them, if we show that we "know." I remember as a young man closing Richard Armstrong's volume 'God and the Soul' with the thought in my mind that the strongest argument he produced was his own certainty of God, that he knew there is a God. Many another book, more elaborate in argument and more renowned for its contribution than 'God and the Soul' have I closed since then, with the same idea. The man who has had experience of God will always awaken faith in others. Yet that faith will always be doubtful and hesitant and lacking the most vital element of faith if it has to be added, "they don't reason things out" or "they haven't reasoned things out," and, most of all, if it has to be stated, "they can't reason things out."

This brings me to the foremost thing which Unitarians have to offer concerning Religion—a reasoned and a reasonable faith in God. By this is meant a faith which in no way contradicts the knowledge which is coming to us from sources other than those which are usually termed religious, from science, philosophy, art, &c., and above all from history, the long record of the experience of men and nations. It is impossible for me to go into the question now, but I am convinced that the strongest argument for the belief in God will be the historical, which is, so far, the least developed. It will reveal most clearly of all that in spite of human waywardness and wilfulness, there has been progress, the accomplishment of ends, a providential order which man with all his violence has never been able to destroy, and, consequently, divine purpose. The most unbelieving of men are forced to admit a Power above them. They may term that Power inscrutable and unknowable. Finally, through history they will come to believe, especially if they look beyond what is, after all, considered universally, the narrow sphere in which man has liberty of will, that there is a divinity which shapes our ends in purposive Love.

The Unitarian takes into consideration all the spheres of knowledge and action, nothing human being alien to him, and offers as a result to both young and old a faith which will stand the fiery trial of reason and experience. If it fails under this test at any point, he urges not that facts should be twisted to accord with faith, but that faith should be enriched so as to be equal to the facts. The Church with all its advantages and charms carries still a crippling burden, which is disastrous to the allegiance of liberty-loving souls, namely, that sad inheritance from the controversies of the third and fourth centuries, the inheritance which, according to my reading, signalises the victory of a Gnosticism which was supposed to be defeated, the inheritance that theory is supreme over fact and authority over experience. The revived study of history will sweep this clean away, and finally, I believe, will show that the foundation of faith is not to be discovered where it has been sought in the past in theological theory, or in what is no other than the spurious rationalism of Gnosticism, nor where many are endeavouring to find it at the present time at some isolated point of history, but in the universal consciousness of mankind.

I hope this is not too technical. Expressed in plain terms it simply amounts to this, that at the present time there are three competitors for the basis of faith, first, what may be termed "supernatural theory," second, what is termed "historical fact," but what would be better described as "spasmodic revelation in time," and thirdly, the universal consciousness and experience of mankind. It is because Mr. Britling's theology and Mr. Wells's book 'God, the Invisible King' are based upon consciousness and experience to-day that I give them a joyous welcome, much as I differ from the conclusions reached.

Out of this faith in religious consciousness come certain very significant messages which we have to deliver to our young people. First, we have to say to them, not only that you may, but you ought to co-ordinate your religion with your knowledge and experience. Some years ago in conversation with an orthodox friend, who was the headmistress of a High School, I said, "I should like to know how you manage to square your theology with astronomy," a subject which she was teaching at the time. She replied quite frankly "I never allow them to come together. I am not going to run the risk of losing my soul," she added very earnestly, "by letting my knowledge destroy my faith." I ought to have been startled, but I wasn't,—for the simple reason that this is the general attitude of well-educated orthodox people. Now we say very definitely, Bring your knowledge and experience into close connection with your religion. Let each influence the other: and the result will be a saner and more helpful religion and the revelation to you of the sacredness of both knowledge and experience. Even then you may lack what is known as religious fervour, but in the depths of your spiritual self and in your common life you will have a divine assurance, a faith which none of the events of time will permanently shake.

In the second place, we want you to understand the value, especially for yourself, of your own consciousness. We make a beginning not with any creed or book or theory or "past historical fact," but with you; and from your own inner divine life, which is rooted and grounded in God, we ask you to build up the structure of your faith. In one sense, we have absolutely nothing to offer you. At best, we can only give you a little guidance, for what we wish you to know is the vastness and even the majesty of the spiritual content of your own soul.

Thirdly, you may think that all this is too intensely personal, individual and subjective. Well, we do want you to think of religion as your own personal affair—a direct relationship between your own soul and God. But we have something else to say. Your personality is largely a social inheritance, a social accumulation. It is due to the response which you have given to the influences about you. Into your very being have been built the spiritual forces of your environment, the very souls of your father, mother, brothers and sisters, and also in some degree the soul of the society, the nation, the humanity with which you are associated. You are what you are because of the nature of these and the extent and manner in which you have absorbed or rejected them. Personality is essentially social in character. And you fall into an obvious error if you think you have developed or can develop apart from these: you can no more grow in isolation from them than a plant can grow without the assistance of the air that surrounds it or the rain which waters it. Your evolution depends upon your involvement of the things of the spirit. Nothing lives except it be in relation to something else: the death of any creature is simply its inability to maintain its relations to the forces about it. It is the same with you. Only in society are you able to live. Only through love can you attain your highest. It is because of this that worship, and especially public worship, is a necessity. You must keep in touch with the noblest life about you and with persons who are seeking the noblest and endeavouring to come into vital touch with God, from whom came your soul and the souls of all men.

That leads us, therefore, in the fourth place, to say to you that you are part of the great Universe, an inalienable part of it, and more of a personality for that very reason. The universe is one and under the governance of one God. History is all of a piece. As the Apostle Paul said, "The earnest expectation of the creation waiteth for the revealing of the sons of God." The whole trend of history from the time when "the morning stars sang together and all the sons of God shouted for joy" until now has been towards the manifestation of the spiritual in man. You are called to take your part and to share in this divine movement. The law of right is "no provincialism of this planet," no mere temporary arrangement for the convenience of human society. The whole force of the universe is behind every noble thought and righteous deed. The whole round earth and every star and planet are "bound by gold chains about the feet of God." No small act of duty or of love is done by the humblest of us, but there is a spiritual power throughout the universe and at its furthest limit which responds to it and of which it is an expression.

Look also at the other side. With truth it has been said that when we ask for a drop of rain to fall out of its natural season, we are really asking for the suspension of the law of gravitation. And when we break a moral law, our offence is against a system not less comprehensive in its scope. When a ruler and his entourage are guilty of an act of aggression, through ambition and the lust of power, we know that they set to work forces which injure the whole of mankind. But their offence does not stop there. They are guilty of a sin against a law which extends further than imagination can soar. The same statement has to be made of the smallest moral delinquency. Unitarianism is not a little architectural scheme of theology like those of the past. It is fraught with vast issues, and replete with the comprehensiveness of things divine. It teaches you that the moral law is infinite, universal and external, that it is bound up with every other natural and divine law, and that in bringing your life into harmony with it, you are going to gain the things men most deeply desire—happiness, peace, self-realisation, divine sonship, and eternal life.

There follows logically from all this the truths which Unitarianism has long taught and which it is necessary to realise, your kinship to Jesus. Far removed as you may seem from him in thought and action, you belong to the same family. Latent within you is every divine quality which you admire and reverence in him, and from every failure, lapse and defeat, you may rise with the thought in your heart, I too am a child of God and may overcome the world which he conquered. Divine life is all before you and about you, waiting for you to claim it, and the message proclaimed of old sounds in your ears to-day, "The Spirit himself beareth witness with our spirit, that we are the children of God: and if children, then heirs: heirs of God and joint heirs with Christ: if so be that we suffer with him that we may be also glorified with him."

There is much more that Unitarianism has to offer to you, but it cannot be even mentioned now. Perhaps you think that all this sounds solemn and serious. Well, life is a serious business—and so is happiness. Happiness is never in the possession of the flippant, the frivolous and the foolish. We wish you to know that the life to which we invite you is a joyous pilgrimage, which is the natural result of a life of love, of service and goodness. Once an orthodox Christian said to me, "The thing I cannot understand about you Unitarians is that you are so jolly." If I read the New Testament aright, the same thing could be said of the early Christians. We are "jolly," because our belief makes us glad. Ours is a religion of good tidings of great joy. But "Why," you will ask, "all this talk about suffering? Only a minute ago you repeated the words of St. Paul, 'if we suffer with Christ, we shall be glorified with him.'" The answer is that the word translated "suffer" in this sentence really means "experience." If we experience with him we shall be glorified with him. The Unitarian's religion, the real Christian religion, is one of supreme joy and confident hope. "If your morals make you dreary, depend upon it they are wrong," said Robert Louis Stevenson. You may take that as the test of any religion, as well as of morality.

The great aim of Unitarians, which you are invited cordially to share, is to proclaim a religion that shall make you and all your comrades reverent, worshipful, sweetly reasonable, sane, dutiful, peaceful, gentle and cheerful—a religion based upon experience springing naturally out of human life, and in no way preventing the full, joyous expression of life. This religion we offer to both young and old.

The Rev. T. P. Spedding.—The Committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association at their meeting on Nov. 13, made a gift of book to the Rev. T. P. Spedding, accompanied by a cheque for one hundred pounds, as a mark of their appreciation of his services as Missionary Agent.

A SERVICE in commemoration of John Harvard, founder of Harvard University, will be held at Southwark Cathedral, on Saturday, November 30, at 3 P.M. The Archbishop of York will preach, and the American Embassy, the Harvard Club, and the Master and Fellows of Emmanuel College, Cambridge (Harvard's College), will be represented. Americans in London are invited to be present.

BOOKS AND REVIEWS.

OLD TESTAMENT ETHICS AND THEOLOGY.

THE Rev. A. W. Fox's book on this subject, issued in the series of 'Modern Handbooks' (Lindsey Press, 3s. 6d. net) is a thoroughly useful book. It is alike scholarly and readable. It deals with one of the most important subjects connected with religion as generally taught and cultivated. Its tone is sincere and moderate; at the same time we feel the author to be quick and alert, in fact just the friend most of us need at hand when we try to understand the Scriptures. Evidently, Mr. Fox's long experience as a teacher on Biblical subjects to classes widely representative in theological opinion has fitted him to combine decision of judgment on controverted points with a frank courtesy which precludes animosity. Altogether the book must be classed among the most successful of its kind published among us.

In an introductory chapter the author brings us into the proper frame of mind for such a study, bespeaking candid courage but maintaining earnestness and reverence. Then he successively deals with the earlier traditions and usages of the Hebrews, Mosaism, the prophets and their literature, the religion of a sacred scripture, of sacred song, and of the wisdom and allied biblical writings. A very good bibliography supplies the student with all necessary guidance in further progress. The standpoint adopted is that of modern critical history, but the good sense of the author saves him (and his readers) from plunging into the vagaries which have beguiled extremists to their confusion. While it cannot be said that the whole field of biblical story is as yet cleared of thorns and pit-falls, a fair perusal of this little volume, taken together with a fair knowledge of the Bible itself (by no means common to all who claim to be "advanced" thinkers) will go far to render the subject not only clear and comprehensible, but eminently interesting.

The following passages taken from Mr. Fox's 'Epilogue' to the book will illustrate the spirit of the whole work:—

"The present survey of Hebrew Religion and Ethics has attained certain definite conclusions, which are more than provisional, and seem likely to stand secure. Revelation has been shown to be no completed process, but a gradual development along the centuries. From crude beginnings Hebrew thought soared slowly to lofty heights in the conception of man's relation to God and to his neighbour. First Jehovah was a family or tribal, then a national God, whose power was limited to his own land, where his care was bestowed upon his own people alone. By the teaching of the prophets his universality was made clear, though to the end he was believed to watch over his chosen people with especial providence. The events of history conspired to exalt the power of the priest, until the Torah became supreme, and Israel was changed into the 'people of a book.' Then there was no longer room for prophets like those of the golden age of prophecy, and the mass of the people looked forward eagerly to the coming of a Messiah or deliverer, who with combined secular and sacred attributes would reign in glory over the Hebrew nation. The steps of this development are to be found in the Old Testament hewn out by Moses, the prophets, the psalmists, and the law-givers. The conception of Jahveh was more or less spiritual from the beginning, since he was worshipped by no image. But it broadened and deepened, until the crude anthropomorphic ideas of the earliest ages passed away to appear no more.

"Corresponding to this growth in the conception of the nature and being of God was a similar progress in ethical ideas. To this the great prophets contributed in no small measure, who realized that Jahveh was a righteous God, who could only be truly served by righteousness of life and character. These profound thinkers prepared the way for the coming of Jesus, who was to be the last and greatest of their order, a prophet not to Israel alone, but the founder of a universal religion, best fitted to the needs of mankind. Hence arises the importance of the study of the Old Testament without preconceptions or prejudices.... God's method of gradually revealing himself through man to man has been seen in the story of one ancient race. It has nowhere been suggested that any such revelation has been confined to the Hebrews; but nowhere outside of the Old Testament can it be traced so faithfully or with so much advantage to the student. At the same time it must be borne in mind that the book of revelation is not yet closed, nor will ever be closed so long as truths remain to be discovered and thinking minds are left to discover them."

We heartily commend the volume to people in search of a simple and straightforward presentation of the view taken by our wisest scholars of the way in which Hebrew morals and Hebrew religion developed during a thousand years. In the second edition, which ought to be soon reached, the author will doubtless touch up a few sentences that need slight readjustment.

SORROW'S SECRET.

JOYFUL SORROW. By L. N. B. London: Constable & Co. 4s. net.

THIS is a little book (perhaps not too happily named, though its title is its only imperfection) which we might well make it our business this Christmas time to put into the hands of those of our friends who have suffered bereavement during the war. It does not pretend to be a complete Anthology, and its author has not, happily, been led away by the desire to include too familiar quotations of an obviously consolatory type which are often nothing more than platitudes in rhyme. With a rare and delicate judgment he—or should it not be she?—has gathered together a sheaf of verses, chiefly from modern writers, passages from the Psalms or New Testament, one or two prose extracts from the writings of Newman, Stevenson, John Bunyan, and Mrs. Alfred Gatty's 'Parable of the Grub and the Dragonfly,' any one of which is sufficient to create in sensitive souls that atmosphere of loving trust in which hope comes to birth again after a period of intense sorrow. There are here some beautiful verses by Lionel Johnson, including the poem to his friend, H. B. Irving—one of the most perfect things of its kind we have ever read; several tender little poems by Katharine Tynan, full of pride in the beloved dead and humility before God who has them in His keeping; two or three of Rupert Brooke's best-known sonnets—shall we ever fail to be thrilled by those wonderful lines,

Safe shall be my going,
Secretly armed against all death's endeavour;
Safe though all safety's lost; safe where men fall;
And if these poor limbs die, safest of all?

one or two precious song-snatches from the 'Gitangali' of Tagore; Aubrey de Vere's Count each affliction, whether light or grave,
God's messenger sent down to thee;
Major Baring's brave and triumphant tribute to Julian Grenfell, and (of another period, but bearing the same heroic message) Henry Vaughan's exquisite lines on 'Peace,' beginning

My soul, there is a country
Afair beyond the stars.

The compiler of this admirable selection claims that "it bears witness to the splendour that remains in the face of sorrow, and to the joy that can be found by all who have learned to understand that there is no such thing as death." It does all that and more: it takes us by the pathway of imperishable beauty into the very heart of life and the presence of the Eternal. Could we possibly say more to commend it to those who mourn?

In a pamphlet 'Christianity and War,' published by the Wm. Morris Press, Ltd., Manchester, and obtainable at Essex Hall (price 3d.), Mr. G. G. Armstrong gives us three addresses delivered by him at the meetings of the Northumberland and Durham Unitarian Association last month. All three are imbued with intense moral earnestness and are expressed in clear and forcible language. In 'The Churches and the Coming Peace,' he recalls the responsibility of religious people for uplifting the ideals and purposes of the nation, and in 'War and Belief in God' he offers wise and reassuring words to those who will be content to refrain from over-bold theories and glad to build their religion on the solid rock of moral and spiritual experience. In 'The Soldiers and Unitarianism' Mr. Armstrong gives some candid criticism of dogmatic Unitarians on the one side, and of ritualistic Free Catholics on the other, specially deprecating the "tone of authority" into which the latter sometimes fall. The addresses well merit perusal by ministers and laity alike, and are a welcome contribution to the life and thought of our churches.

DR. STANLEY A. MELLOR has published a pamphlet entitled 'Christian Ethics and Sex Morality' (Booksellers' Co., 70 Lord Street, Liverpool, 6d.). Its leading note is "the indwelling of God in human personality," and it emphasises the specifically Christian judgment on the different points connected with the sex problem in our state of society. Thus the author maintains "equality of personality in man and woman" with the implication of equal rights and duties. The ideals of social purity are forcibly presented, and the author does not shrink from dealing in explicit terms with such questions as the marriage relation, divorce, prostitution, family limitation, &c. We understand from the foreword by Dr. Mellone, as President of the Union for Social Service, that on the committee of the Union difference of opinion in regard to some points prevented the adoption of the pamphlet as representing the view of all the members; but it is put forth in the hope that it may prove suggestive and "stimulate thought on this vital question." That it will do so in the case of any thoughtful reader is certain.

THE author of 'J'Accuse,' Dr. Richard Grelling, has offered the "new popular Government" of Germany his co-operation for the peace and reconstruction of that country, and is, we understand, returning thither. He demands, among other things, the revocation of the interdiction of his books.

THE Boys' Welfare Association has started a Journal which will be known as its representative organ, and is intended to convey the kind of information most likely to be of use to Welfare supervisors all over the country. Our duty towards the rising generation, especially in these critical times, is clearly marked out for all of us, and we hope the movement of which this periodical is the outcome will develop on broad and constructive lines.

CORRESPONDENCE.

DEATH AND IMMORTALITY.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—In the striking article entitled 'Out of the Valley' in your last number the diverse views which prevail on the great questions of Death and Immortality are said to be represented by three "chief types" or classes, of which the last is described as too much absorbed in the things of this world to care about anything else. But surely a fourth class is needed to embrace those—probably a large number—who do care, but who, following the advice of the great Roman poet, have resolved to depart from life as a satisfied guest, grateful for what is past, but not expecting and perhaps not greatly desiring a second invitation.*

In which of the four, moreover, would the writer enroll himself? If, as would appear, in none, must we not recognise yet a fifth class, viz., of those who on grounds of religion, philosophy, sentiment or tradition, or all these combined, have a firm belief in their own immortality and that of their friends, and of the great departed of past ages, without perhaps taking into account all the difficulties that arise when one attempts to include the whole human race both past and to come: difficulties which may well suggest some sort of selection as their best solution? Does not the Apostle Paul himself, indeed, suggest this solution when he speaks of attaining the resurrection from the dead, as if it were a doubtful matter? (Phil. iii. 11). The writer says he is not a spiritualist, and yet is not spiritualism, after all, so far of course as it can be authenticated, the most tangible evidence we have of human survival? Only it is well to remember that a few cases of spirit communication, granting their absolute authenticity, by all the rules of logic can never prove more than this, that some spirits survive for some time.

The wisest writers on this subject will be found, if I mistake not, to speak of human immortality as a hope rather than a belief, and one consolatory thought there is in which all the classes enumerated can join, that whoever has that hope cannot possibly be disappointed.—Yours, &c.,

TOYS FOR FEEBLE-MINDED CHILDREN.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—Last year a few of your readers were so generous as to send us some most welcome contributions for our Christmas tree, which gave great pleasure to our children, now numbering 260. Toys are as hard to obtain as ever, so I shall be grateful if you will allow me once more to appeal in your columns for toys of any kind. Our Christmas party is to be held before Christmas, and as we are already making our arrangements I shall be doubly grateful if friends will act upon the motto—Bis dat qui cito dat.—Yours &c.

THE THANKSGIVING SERVICE OF THE FREE CHURCHES.

BY virtue of a little talisman we were able to secure a good seat at Albert Hall last Saturday afternoon. An hour before the Service began the interior of the building presented an imposing spectacle, tier upon tier of closely packed humanity meeting the eye unto the topmost balcony. The organ with cornet accompaniment provided a selection of music during the waiting time, but Dr Meyer, who appeared to be master of ceremonies, asked the audience to refrain from any applause as it was a religious service.

A few minutes before 3 o'clock the hum of voices died away into an expectant silence, then by some unseen signal the audience all rose. It was not, however, the royal visitors but Mr. Lloyd George and his family. His hair seemed nearly white and the broad shoulders told of the burden of State—a great change from our recollection of him eight years ago. Again we rose. This time it was Mr and Mrs. Asquith who were conducted to front seats on the opposite side of the gangway to the Premier. Once more the audience were on their feet and the procession of Free Church dignitaries told us that the august party had arrived. Immediately they had occupied the seats prepared for them facing the orchestra from which the speakers officiated, the service began with the singing of the doxology. The venerable Dr Clifford invoked the divine blessing and led in the Lord's Prayer. His voice revealed the familiar intonation but was feebler than of yore. The Old Hundred was then sung, and looking round we noticed that the coup d'œil had been brightened by patches of khaki. These represented the soldiers of the guard of honour who now filled the steps of the gangways dividing the stalls.

Selections from Isaiah and Revelation were read by the Rev. R. C. Gillie, followed by a short liturgy of Prayer and Thanksgiving conducted by the Rev. S. Chadwick. Then we sang 'Praise my soul the King of Heaven' and the Rev. J. H. Shakespeare offered the Free Prayer. The advantages and disadvantages of the extempore art were illustrated. When the speaker said feelingly "Bless the King" there were responsive Amens and "Bless the people" evoked a still louder response. Afterwards he prayed for the Prime Minister that he might be spared for many years to discharge his responsible duties. This was, perhaps, rather unfortunately phrased, considering that we are on the eve of a general election and that his honourable opponent was present. But possibly nobody else noticed it. The fine hymn by Bishop How 'For all the Saints who from their labours rest' followed, and was most sympathetically sung by the vast congregation, forming perhaps the most affecting item in the service, and then we sat down to hear Dr. Jowett. In listening to him after the lapse of years we missed a certain timbre of voice which formerly made its appeal. Now the tone was harder but the notes strong and clear.

What he gave was an address and not a sermon, and the mode of appeal was indirect, perhaps, in view of the State notabilities before him. There was some fine phrasing. After reminding his hearers of the perils past Dr Jowett laid stress upon the tasks ahead. They had called forth hearts of chivalrous intent; let them make every land a holy land. We had to dedicate ourselves to a still greater task. We had to create an atmosphere in which great things shall be done. Such was the tenor of a ten minutes discourse. 'God bless our native land' was the final hymn, finishing up with a verse of the National Anthem. The Rev. C. Hooper pronounced the benediction "The Lord bless you, the Lord cause his face to shine upon you, the Lord lift up the light of his countenance upon you and give you peace." Still standing he waited the exit of the royal procession. So ended the first Non-conformist gathering, we are told, at which an English King has been officially present. If it did not reach in expression the possible heights and depths of religious experience, no one was to blame: it was in the nature of things; the restraints of a State occasion have their drawbacks. And We cannot kindle when we will

A JAPANESE ship-builder lately purchased numerous pictures, drawings, etchings, &c., by modern artists, English, French, and Italian, and the art correspondent of The Times says "there is every reason to believe that his selections have been extremely happy ones, which will bear the test of severe scrutiny." His purchases were all stored until the end of the war, and they will now, we suppose, be sent to Japan, to help on the process of educating the East in Western ideas which has been so rapid in recent times.

THE HOISTING OF THE FLAGS.

ON receipt of the news—a few hours too soon, but that was no matter!—the people of one of the loveliest cities on the Mediterranean coast of France came swiftly together in all their radiant colours, where these were possible; and mingling with the troops and a great number of military visitors they thronged the Place, some 30,000 strong. In the midst a small space was kept around the flag-staff that reared far into the clear night above. The soldiers as they marched triumphantly into the square bore brilliant flambeaux aloft, and the bands played their most jubilant strains as one rank after another took its allotted place.

Then there came a pause. The tricolour of France was ascending the mast, and as it flowed out against the dark velvet blue of that southern sky the soul-stirring music of the 'Marseillaise' broke out, joined impetuously by the voices of those thousands of Frenchmen and Frenchwomen singing as they never sang before, "Marchons, Marchons," till the hearer's heart leapt again. The flag of Great Britain followed, then the flags of Italy, Belgium, and the United States, each being hailed by the playing of the national anthem or the country represented. The appropriate touch of comedy, where all else was so dramatically intense, was provided by the remark of an American officer as "Old Glory" waved its gleaming stars and stripes to the tune of the 'Star-spangled Banner'—"Well, I reckon that tune beats all the others to a jazz"—whatever that may be.

When that ever memorable singing was all over, and the cheers were hushed, the band once more took up its part, amid a silence broken only by soft sounds of a grief not without sacred hopes and blessed consolations. It was the sad sweet music of Chopin's 'Funeral March.'

MEMORIAL NOTICE.

MISS CHAMBERLAIN.

MISS BEATRICE CHAMBERLAIN, the eldest daughter of the late Mr. Joseph Chamberlain, M.P., died from pneumonia, following influenza on Tuesday, at her London residence in Egerton Crescent, S.W., in the presence of her brother, Mr. Austen Chamberlain; her half-brother, Mr. Neville Chamberlain; and other members of the family. Miss Chamberlain, who was 56 years of age, had been for many years actively identified with various aspects of public, political, social, and philanthropic work in Birmingham and London. In her younger days, when residing at Highbury, she was her father's constant companion in the fulfilment of many of his most important engagements. In this way she developed a keen interest in politics, and rendered her brother Mr. Austen Chamberlain valuable assistance during the time he was member of Parliament for East Worcestershire. Her advice was eagerly sought in matters of organisation, particularly during the electoral contests in the division. As an official of the Women's Liberal Unionist Association in the constituency she occasionally addressed meetings, and, being an attractive and convincing speaker, she was able to render effective support to the cause she had at heart, although her diffidence was such that she would rarely address a gathering in the presence of members of the press. A few years ago Miss Chamberlain took up her residence in London, but she did not cease her activities in East Worcestershire and in Birmingham. When the war broke out her co-operation was invoked in the promotion of various patriotic movements, and she came from London to help in the establishment of the Lady Mayoress's Depôt for providing parcels of food and clothing for Birmingham prisoners of war. She was also exceedingly active in furthering the success of the Derby scheme of recruiting.

In London Miss Chamberlain's services commanded equal respect. She was especially concerned in securing the social betterment of women munition workers, and she was an ardent worker for the British Red Cross, more particularly in relation to its work at railway centres. In May last she was appointed one of the seven ladies to serve on the committee appointed to consider the Luxury Tax proposed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The London correspondent of The Birmingham Daily Post alludes to "the burning patriotism she displayed throughout the war. Without abating her accustomed public activities, she threw herself with eagerness into the economy and war savings campaigns. Her friends feared that she was over-taxing her strength by all this varied work, and she herself almost acknowledged the realisation of the fact, but she persevered right up to the moment of her fatal illness, in the course of which she expressed her happiness at having been spared to see the war so gloriously end. Her width of knowledge was as great as her breadth of sympathy—so great, indeed, as to astonish long-experienced men of affairs brought into association with her. She spent herself without stint for the public good; and her very many friends, not only in this country, but in France and America, will deeply mourn her loss."

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Aberdeen.—At a meeting of the congregation of the Unitarian Church held on Sunday evening, November 17, after service, the following resolution, moved by the Minister, the Rev. H. Dawtrey, and seconded by Councillor Beaton, was passed: "That this meeting demands the immediate withdrawal of Regulation 40 D. D.O.R.A., which was passed without the consent of Parliament, which constitutes a grave menace to the liberty and civil rights of all women, which perpetuates a vicious double standard of morality, and which has been proved to be a futile method of regulating vice." Copies of this resolution are being sent to the Prime Minister, the Home Secretary, and the local Members of Parliament, Colonel Pirie and Sir John Fleming.

Bolton: Unity Church.—The news of the signing of the armistice brought a great crowd to the Town Hall Square on November 11, when a Service of Thanksgiving was held, the Mayor, Lord Leverhulme, presiding. The Minister of Unity Church, the Rev. Edward Morgan, was invited to be present with the other ministers of the town on the steps of the Town Hall, where those taking part in the service assembled. In the evening a United Service was held in the Victoria Hall (Wesleyan), in which Mr. Morgan was again invited to take part. It was a wonderful service, the great hall being crowded. On Sunday evening, November 17, a Thanksgiving Service was held in Unity Church, a large congregation being present. The names of the seventeen members of the church who had given their lives in the great war were read, the congregation all standing. Special music was rendered by the choir. Immediately following the service the congregation accompanied Mr. Morgan to Emmanuel Parish Church where a United Service of Thanksgiving was held, the Vicar and the Curate, and the Wesleyan, Congregationalist, Independent Methodist, and Unitarian ministers all taking part. The church was crowded and the service, unique in the history of the district, was greatly appreciated.

Chatham.—Special Thanksgiving services to celebrate the cessation of hostilities were held at Hamond Hill Unitarian Church on Sunday, November 17, conducted by the minister, the Rev. F. Cottier. There were good congregations, and many members of the Chatham and District Trades Council had accepted an invitation to be present. Special music was provided by the organist, Mr. Daniels. The feelings of all present were well expressed in the singing of 'Now thank we all our God,' and 'When wilt Thou save the people.' Mr. Cottier, in a discourse on 'God as our Leader,' emphasised the great responsibilities devolving upon those who are alive at this moment when so many have fallen, and the necessity for preparing the soul to receive what further light and truth God has to reveal.

Chester.—The 218th Anniversary of the founding of Matthew Henry's Chapel, the oldest Nonconformist place of worship in the city, was celebrated on Sunday last, Nov. 17. In the absence of the appointed preacher, the Rev. Arthur H. Coar, the pulpit was occupied by the Rev. W. R. Hart, of New Jersey, U.S.A., a chaplain with the American Y.M.C.A., at present in this country. The services were well attended. A Scholars' Service was held in the afternoon, Mr. Hart giving the address. Appropriate hymns were sung during the day, with the National Anthem at the close of each service. The collections took the form of a Thanksgiving offering on the signing of the armistice, and were in aid of the Chester Royal Infirmary.

Chowbent.—Out of the 140 boys on its Roll of Honour, Chowbent Chapel has lost 22 during the war, two families having each lost two sons, one of these families having as many as four sons on service. Among the survivors of the 140 Second Lieut. Fred Greenhalgh has been awarded the Military Cross, Lance-Corporal Frank Glover the Military Medal, and Private William Stewart the Military Medal. An impressive service of Thanksgiving and Remembrance was held on Sunday morning last, conducted by the Rev. J. J. Wright.

Colne.—The Church Anniversary Services were held in the Stanley Street Church last Sunday, when the Rev. Matthew R. Scott preached morning and evening. On Sunday morning, November 10, the minister, the Rev. J. Pipkin, conducted a service in memory of Second Lieut. Rufus Irving of the Lancs. Fusiliers who was killed in action in France on October 31. Prior to enlisting in 1914 he was a teacher in the Sunday school and a member of the church choir. As one of a family closely associated with the church his death is greatly regretted.

Exeter.—The Rev. Donald Fraser, minister of the Unitarian Church, and formerly of Pembroke Chapel, Liverpool, has been adopted as Labour candidate for the Tiverton Division of Devon.

Leeds: Mill Hill.—Services of Thanksgiving for the cessation of hostilities were held last Sunday, the pulpit being draped with the Union Jack and the Stars and Stripes, and appropriate music, including the Hallelujah Chorus, being sung. In the morning the preacher was Lieut.-Col. Bullock, who dealt with the question of a League of Nations and the part which the Church should play in reconstruction. The Church, he said, must make itself as attractive as the public-house, especially as a meeting-place for young people; find some remedy for social evils instead of merely denouncing them; study and investigate social conditions, and bring them to the notice of the authorities. Let them pray: 'Thy Kingdom come in Leeds as it is in Heaven,' for God was just as much concerned about what was happening in Leeds as He was about what happened in Heaven. At night the pulpit was occupied for the first time by the Rev. Bertram Smith, co-pastor of Salem Congregational Church, Leeds, who gave an address on 'My Experiences in Salonika.' In the course of his remarks he pointed out that there was a very different spirit among the troops in Macedonia from that which he had come across in France. There was, for instance, much less readiness to join in the choruses of the popular songs played on the hut piano, and to gain the men's confidence it did not do to be too optimistic. He considered this due to: (a) the climate, with its extremes of heat and torrential rain, accompanied by plagues of locusts and other insects; (b) the desolate state of the country, not a single habitation being visible within a radius of 25 miles; (c) the ravages of malaria; (d) the lack of sympathy from home. On that day, when they all felt extremely thankful to the men in khaki, let them not forget that there was a debt due to the heroism of endurance as well as to that of action.

Sheffield.—The proposal of the various Sunday School Associations to establish a Convalescent Home for ex-soldiers of our community as a national war memorial received a warm and unanimous endorsement at a Public Meeting held in the Channing Hall on Monday last. The meeting was called under the auspices of the District Association of Churches and the local Sunday School Union. All the churches and Sunday schools in the district were represented and the proceedings were marked by considerable enthusiasm. The Rev. Charles Peach attended on behalf of the Central Committee and explained the scheme, after which the Chairman, Alderman A. J. Hobson, J.P., the Rev. C. J. Street, M.A., the Rev. A. Hall, M.A., and others strongly commended it to the meeting in a resolution which was carried unanimously. The President of the District Association of Churches, Mr. W. E. Taylor of Doncaster, and the President of the Sunday School Union, Mr. J. Forster of Rotherham, submitted a further resolution appointing a local committee, with Mrs. A. Hall as Treasurer and the Rev. J. W. Lee as Secretary, and this also was carried. A number of subscriptions were promised ranging from one pound to fifty pounds, and there was every indication that the funds for the new Home will be largely helped in this district.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

All letters and manuscripts for the Editor should be sent to 13 Bream's Buildings, Fetter Lane, London, E.C.4. They must reach the Editor not later than Wednesday morning for publication the same week.

As we had good reason to anticipate a very definite reply has been made by the Archbishop of Canterbury to Prof. Adolf Deissmann, who through the Archbishop of Upsala sent a special appeal that he, as a Christian leader, would, with others, use his influence "so that the approaching peace may not contain the seed of new universal catastrophes, but instead release all available conciliatory and rebuilding powers between the nations." In his reply the Archbishop points out the absence of any recognition by Dr. Deissmann of the responsibility of Germany for the outbreak of war—a responsibility to which he called Dr. Deissmann's attention in 1915—of England's urgent endeavours to avoid it, and of the object with which we entered it—"the vindicating of freedom and justice, and the ultimate securing of a righteous peace, which should make war with all its horrors impossible of recurrence."

DR. DEISSMANN'S attention is directed to the conduct of the war on our side as a guarantee that as victors we shall be consistently free from hatred and passion. But, says the Archbishop, we cannot forget the terrible crime of letting loose the war in Europe, nor "the savagery which the German high command has displayed in carrying on the war." Their outrages, which he details, rendered necessary that full security should be taken by the Allied Powers against any repetition being possible. Pointing out that "the position would have been different had there been on the part of Christian circles in Germany any public protest against these gross wrongs, or any repudiation of their perpetrators," he contends that while the terms of the armistice are necessarily strict, they were not dictated by a spirit of mere bitterness or vindictiveness; and from this, he believes, the terms of peace will be equally free. "But righteousness must be vindicated." While we all share the Archbishop's concluding wish for a renewed and deepened Christian fellowship as the best security of the welfare of mankind, it is impossible to avoid observing that as yet no sign of conscious wrong-doing by their nation has come from "Christian circles" in Germany; apparently there is more tenderness of conscience among the Vorwärts circles which are not usually credited with Christian feelings.

* * *

IN a Note last week reference was made to the King's admirable speech addressed to the members of Parliament on the cessation of hostilities, and we ventured to allude to the curiosity sometimes expressed as to the royal share in the actual authorship of this and other addresses which His Majesty has made in these momentous years. We are happy to receive an assurance, on high authority, that the King is in the habit of composing them for himself, though, of course, as a constitutional monarch, he takes care that his responsible advisers are consulted as to the terms employed. The case is no doubt different with regard to the formal "speeches" at the opening and closing of Parliament; but, says our esteemed informant, "taken broadly his speeches are his own," and the fact cannot but increase our respect for one who clearly endeavours to serve his people to the utmost of his strength and ability.

THE Committee recently appointed to consider the question of retaining Regulation 40 D of the Defence of the Realm Act has substantially, though not in form, decided against its principle, by recommending, with practical unanimity we are told, its withdrawal at once. There are two minds about the treatment of vice as leading to disease, one of strict medical control, along with open connivance or even encouragement of prostitution, the other of purely moral suasion accompanied by as much restriction as is possible. No one who knows the appalling facts of the extent to which venereal disease has scourged and impaired the strength of the Army can fail to understand the intense earnestness of those who, having little or no trust—or it may be interest—in the moral policy, desire to apply some effectual measure of hygiene; and any of us who rejoice, as we do ourselves, on the withdrawal of a regulation which has placed women in grossly unjust peril of insult while men were left uncontrolled, cannot wisely or honourably let the matter rest where it is. Among the most imperative needs of the time is a crusade against uncleanness.

"THE Unitarians," says the Rev. J. H. Shakespeare in his book 'The Churches at the Cross-Roads,' "lie outside the range of Evangelicalism." Even so—if by Evangelicalism is meant, as he evidently thinks, a religious movement bound up with the doctrines of "the Incarnation, the Cross, and the Resurrection." We have read Mr. Shakespeare's chapters with much sympathy, recognising not only his shrewdness as a practical organiser, but also his fervour as a lover of souls. At the least, we should hope, his Evangelical Free Church brethren will be moved by this appeal to close up their ranks, and federate if they may not yet coalesce. As to the vision of the future re-union of Nonconformity with the Episcopal Church, it appears even to him a distant one; to us who are "outside" it seems very distant indeed—more's the pity, if indeed both parties really believe the same fundamental doctrines. What Mr. Shakespeare seems not to have approached is the prior question of just how much genuine and unshaken belief there is among the so-called orthodox in an Incarnation bound up with the stories of the Virgin Birth, and a Resurrection bound up with the stories of a physical Ascension. Granted, as it must be, that a good many religious people are glad to feel without close thinking, is it not certain that many who are ostensibly inside Orthodoxy are outside of Evangelicalism?

THE death last week of Lieut.-Col. Llewellyn W. Longstaff of Wimbledon recalls a name honoured among our churches years ago. He was the eldest son of the late Dr. G. D. Longstaff, and with his father had an active share in the direction of the business of Messrs.

Blundell Spence & Co., manufacturing chemists, of Hull, introducing several beneficent changes in the relations between employers and workpeople. Among his numerous scientific enthusiasms was that of geographical exploration and he generously supported Antarctic expeditions. His son, Capt. T. G. Longstaff, is a well-known Asiatic explorer and mountaineer, and his brother, Dr. G. B. Longstaff, who was formerly on the London County Council, has exhibited similar energy in scientific pursuits and social progress. The founder of the family, Dr. G. D. Longstaff, who died at a great age in 1892, was an ardent co-worker with the celebrated Unitarian preacher, the Rev. George Harris, and generously supported several of our churches in different parts of the country.

The Social Service Quarterly, the organ of the Union for Social Service of Unitarians and others, in addition to the usual valuable articles and news interesting to members and the alert public announces the resignation of the office of Treasurer by the Rev. F. H. Jones. "It is doubtful," we read, "whether any other Treasurer could have maintained the Union on its present basis through recent critical times." The Secretary, the Rev. H. H. Johnson, is acting also as Treasurer pro tem. We regret to say that Mr. Jones's illness, on account of which he resigned, has laid him aside for many weeks, and continues serious. On behalf of a large circle of attached friends we would tender to him warmest sympathy, and the assurance of grateful and affectionate regard.

THE Czecho-Slovak Republic is said to be the most promising of stability among the newly arisen states of Central Europe. Its President-Elect, Prof. T. G. Masaryk, to whose warm interest in liberal religion we recently called attention, is now on his way from America to be inaugurated in his new office at Prague, and is expected to pass through London. He assured a Zionist audience in New York a short time ago that freedom of religion would be among the chief features of his country's policy. "Only free nations," he said, "can constitute a liberal mankind." His attitude toward the German Social Democrats is one of cautious reserve, noting as he does that they were sturdy upholders of Kaiserism until the last stages of the war. The Czecho-Slovak forces are being carefully organised in case of military measures being needed, but Dr. Masaryk's hope is that German militarism will be so effectually restricted by the terms of the Peace that his nation's army will not be more than a police protection.

* * *

It is interesting to observe that in addition to the intended visit of President Wilson we may see the ex-President, Mr. Taft, among the United States representatives at the Peace Conference. If it is possible to give a personal greeting to our distinguished brother in the faith during his stay on this side, we trust our organisers will embrace the opportunity.

THE POLITICAL ATMOSPHERE.

THE dissolution of Parliament last Monday has given rise to much regret, many fears, and some hopes. Most people whom we have met, outside of professional partisans, have deplored the swift decadence from those high moods and strenuous resolves which have so long united the nation into the strife of electioneering. If there were ever a time for magnanimity it was surely on the morrow of our great victory. If ever there were need of grave and considerate counsels it is undoubtedly now, when fateful world decisions are to be made. We believe both the feelings and the business of the nation would have been best consulted by the postponement of this event; the fact that it has been hurried on so impetuously cannot but intensify the apprehensions of the timorous and test the courage of those who still believe in the good sense of our country as a whole.

That there exists real fear in some quarters must be admitted, after making all due abatement for the calculated exaggerations of party agitation. On the one hand the evil name "Bolshevist" conjures up pictures that terrify gentle, orderly, and well-to-do people, and disturb, if they do not altogether dismay, the business world. On the other hand, the severity of the restrictions recently imposed on the national life, the control of trade and manufacture no less than the censorship of speech and the press, and the unparalleled pressure of the military laws, have awakened many a doubt lest, by a bitter irony, those who have suffered and striven to break down imperial despotism should be trapped into a system hardly less rigorous. One side goes about in dread of revolution, the other in grievous anticipations of the tyranny of trusts, tariff-mongers, and exploiters generally. No one can say that there is no ground for apprehension. Certainly, there have been violent words here and there in Labour circles, and there have been outrageous interferences with public liberty on the part of groups of workers, whose action illustrates in little what might become possible on a large scale—with disastrous results—if the men in our great industries learn to substitute main force for the regular development of legal method. No less certainly, it must be said, the stringent tactics of the Coalition organisers, which appear to have troubled even so staunchly Coalitionist an organ as The Times, lest men of undoubted ability, and Labour men especially, should be excluded from a due share of public service, have stirred up resentful alarm in many quarters.

In an atmosphere so charged with ominous forces we have to get along as well as we can, and see to it that our own influence shall be as prudently used as possible. We have lived through elections before, and we shall live through this. We may even thank our stars that scarcity of paper and the new statutory limitation of expenditure are likely to prevent the campaign from degenerating into the overwhelming orgy of abuse and venom that has been seen in years not long ago. In any case there will be enough of it. Quiet-minded persons must recall Milton's saying that "not without dust and heat" are the prizes of life to be attained. What every decent person must desire is that to dust and heat shall not be added poison gas. Whatever conflict of opinion and interest there may be among us we have to live together, and he is the worst enemy of the State who by unjust and wicked accusations and innuendoes destroys goodwill. The adjustment of rival claims is never an easy task, and everyone can see that it is going to be a very hard one during the next months and years. The conditions of the industrial world are sure to involve thousands in circumstances of grave anxiety, not to say certain privation. Here lies the most obvious peril to the stability of things; let the politicians see to it betimes that their measures are both ameliorative and farsighted. Mere donations are at best risky remedies for unemployment; and if we are to have, in the Premier's phrase, a country "fit for heroes" we have also to take care that the heroic temper shall still be cherished in our population, and that no section of them shall be driven by need or tempted by legislative bribery to forsake the pursuit of manly duty as independent and law-abiding citizens. Our own hope is that out of the present hurly-burly, regrettable as it is in so many ways, a new and vigorous current of public life will yet arise, manifesting once more the inborn qualities of our healthful national stock. But this is no time for shallow optimism. We are all on our trial, and cannot afford to abate our energies any more than to lose our heads. We have got through the war; we shall win through the difficulties of the peace, if we all try to be honourably fair-minded toward each other. After all, what shall it profit a politician to win place and power if he loses his own soul, and especially if he corrupts the souls of his fellow-citizens?

THE PEACE AND LOVE OF GOD.

By the Rev. WILFRED HARRIS, M.A., Adelaide.

IN speaking upon the peace of God, I compare it to the quiet, moving, and ceaselessly active might of a great flywheel which I once saw in the power-house of a large cotton factory in Lancashire. Elsewhere in the factory there was a great noise and rattle of the smaller machinery. But here, in the power house, where was generated the silent strength that gave forth for all the various processes of manufacture the necessary driving power, here, comparatively at least, was a wonderful sense of silence; there was a majestic stillness in the calm, sure, and ceaseless, even movement of the great flywheel. There was peace, quiet in its energy, and of tremendous strength. And the peace of God may be likened unto that. It is the driving power of all the worlds; and it is very quiet—it is the peace of God. It is like the great wheel in the central engine room from which the mightiest energies go forth smoothly and silently to all the thousand and one affairs, great and small, dependent upon it. For the best work is done calmly and quietly.

And the centre of all energy, whence power goes forth to all workers in all worlds, is surely the perfection of quiet work and eternal calm, the scene of a wonderful peace—the peace of God. It may be thought of as the stillness and the quiet in which the mind of the Almighty—free from all interruption—is concentrated upon the business of the management and wise direction of all the universe; giving to every department, whether of men or of angels, its special allotment of work, and its own measure of responsibility; and overseeing the quiet and ceaseless working of all things and all beings—working together for good.

As an aid to our thought of the Peace of God and of all the concentrated energy which such a thought of working in perfect stillness suggests, let me instance the desire of men, when they have any great and complicated work on hand, for uninterrupted quiet. There is, for instance, a quiet hour in the morning before other people are up, and when all the world is still; and, again, in the evening, after all the rest have gone to bed. There is a time of peace and quiet which men choose, when any severe strain of concentrated attention is required of them in their work. They desire, in order to do their best work, that they may work in peace. And so of the Almighty and of His work—the work of the infinite Wisdom and Providence and the Driving Power behind all things. Is there not something in the thought of the vastness, and the responsibility and the ceaselessness of the work of God that suggests to us the absolute necessity for the perfect Peace of God? There, in that perfect stillness, the infinite work is done. It is done in the peace of God. And, working in that supreme stillness and quiet at back of all worlds, and supervising in perfect calmness all things, both good and bad, that in one world or another require attention, I believe that God works lovingly. That brings me to my second subject.—the Love of God.

God works lovingly. The wheels of God grind slowly, indeed, but they grind exceedingly fine. A thousand years to Him are but as one day. There is no haste, no hurry, no confusion. But in the long run, through all agonies and all things good and evil that may take their time to work out at last to their perfection—through all things and over all things is the Spirit not alone of wisdom and of absolute truth, and of perfect and unerring justice, and of wondrous and exquisite beauty, but also the spirit of an infinite tenderness, of a personal affection, for all living creatures, of sympathy with all sufferers—a spirit of goodness, of pity, of compassion and of fellowship. Infinitely complicated as his work must be, God works lovingly. I believe that this statement is true of God, whether it is true of any one else or not. I believe it is true that God works lovingly.

I think it is true of men that, more and more as men come to reverence and to think of God, they also begin—perhaps for the first time—to work lovingly. I think they learn this from God. Hatred and self-interest, and a thousand other motives may urge men to be energetic in their own interests, and to the detriment and injury of other living creatures. But gradually, as human thought evolves to higher and higher planes of life and motive, these first instinctive and almost animal motives of hatred and of self-interest come to be regarded as lower motives. For little by little, as men gain deeper knowledge of this wonderful universe, they come into nearer fellowship with the unseen Spirit behind it all. And they cannot escape the discovery that some great power of loving has touched from afar the loveliness of the wayside flower; has given to overwrought woman the relief of tears, and provided for the helpless and hungry babe a very cosy corner indeed on its mother's breast; and that, somewhere in the recesses of the secrets of life, even the most brutal and selfish and heartless of men has discovered a moment of joy and of satisfaction that told even his hardened heart that a love—which he has wronged—has been very loving and very tender to him.

For the world that God is working at in that quiet and sure peace of His almighty soul is not a world of rocks and stones, of burning fire and drowning water, of storm and tempest, and of all things horrible alone. But it is a world where everything is wrapped up in a thousand little love stories; where tenderness peeps out with wistful eyes, and rapture sings, and ears are ever on the listen for the whispering of words of love.

Who, then, has made that world, and made it so? The Almighty. It is a world so deeply and so utterly steeped in the knowledge of love, and in the desire to be loved, that never a young life comes into it but with a love story to tell. And never a life leaves it but with love's story of sorrow and of remembrance. Perchance, not a sparrow yet fell to its rest in God but love's depths of sympathy have quivered awhile at the thought of it. For its tragedy smites the heart of God, as when a raindrop has smitten the sea. For all love to the Infinite Lover returns, even the least little life to the greatest, and every soul to God who gave it. Not in joy alone is love discovered and known. But in weariness love comes; and in grief and pain and agony are the depths of love made manifest; and the bosom of the mighty deep opens, as we knock, to receive and to comfort our souls at the last.

Without the sorrows, the bereavements, the errors, and the miseries of life, who is there would ever know the tenderness, the forgiveness, the comfort, and the almighty strength of love? To the least among God's creatures, and for the greatest, there is a thought of tenderness, a look of sympathy, a word of remembrance—one touch that heals all things—the felt touch of God's love. Deep beyond all fathoming is this outpouring of the inexhaustible love wherewith—in that peaceful stillness and quiet calm of the eternal trust and faith—the Almighty soul goes forth as a lover to win the love of all at the last; and, enduring all the agonies of loving, and suffering all its griefs and sorrows with us, to deserve to win it.

MANCHESTER COLLEGE, OXFORD.

THE Ministers' School held at Manchester College last year proved so helpful and successful in every way that it is being held again this year. The Session extends from October 29 to December 5. As the College buildings are being used by the military authorities for the treatment of wounded soldiers, a commodious private house in Banbury Road, Oxford, was secured both for residence and lectures, and thirteen ministers from various parts of the country have gladly availed themselves of the generous hospitality and educational privileges afforded by the College authorities. The full value of this institution can only be adequately appreciated by those who are participating in its functions. The idea has indeed proved to be a happy inspiration, and the "scholars" will return to their respective ministries greatly profited both in body and mind.

An exceedingly attractive and helpful syllabus of lectures has been arranged for the six weeks over which the Session extends, and includes not only the Principal and staff of the College, but many others whom it is a rare privilege for ministers in active service to hear speaking on those subjects which as experts they have made peculiarly their own. To mention specially any of them would be invidious, and space precludes the mention of them all. The subjects treated have been various; but naturally all of them have a direct interest for the minister of religion.

Each day's proceedings open with a short devotional service conducted in turn by the ministers in residence; and on the Tuesday evening in each week a service is held in the College Chapel, when the devotions are led by one minister and a sermon is preached by another. Everything possible is done for our comfort and our spiritual profit. The relations between lecturers and hearers are ideally fraternal, and the result, therefore, must have a permanent value. The lectures frequently suggest topics for discussion in subsequent periods of leisure amongst the ministers, and frank conference brings with it personal contributions of an extremely helpful character. Then, too, more formal conferences are arranged on at least two evenings each week, when some subject of special interest, religious, national or social, is introduced by one of our number, or by some distinguished man from one or other of the Oxford colleges, who has made such subject his study. All these things create an atmosphere which is stimulating especially to those of us who in our own more or less remote and isolated spheres of ministry have little or no opportunity of exchanging views with our brother ministers, or even of reading books which are up to date.

This fraternisation has a value not to be over-estimated in deepening the sense of real fellowship and corporate unity amongst us, for the underlying principles of our religious faith are found to be conspicuously common to us all, notwithstanding the differences of expression and method which may prevail.

The war is to be deeply regretted for the loss and sorrow it has entailed, and for many other reasons; it is lamentable that Manchester College has been unable for so long to prepare young men for the Christian ministry. But it is no small compensation that its management has seen its way to organise this School for Ministers, and thus afford invaluable opportunities and privileges which could not come within our reach in any other way. Moreover, the value and usefulness of this School do not end there. We shall return to our spheres of work with grateful hearts and enriched minds, and in the natural order of things our congregations will share in the benefits which are being conferred primarily upon us.

CORRESPONDENCE.

LAWRENCE HOUSE.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—Since the appeal for £400 was issued in your columns the military position has altered so greatly that donors may like to know the exact scheme of expenditure which members of the Lawrence House Committee have in view. One Bulletin is going out for Christmas. Further Bulletins will be required before the main body of the military and naval forces is demobilised. But in addition to these Bulletins we have in mind to complete this part of our work by sending a booklet to our sailors and soldiers as a "welcome home" and a memento of their participation in the war. The booklet 'For Freedom and Right,' in its khaki case, was greatly appreciated and proved an encouragement in time of war. A similar booklet of encouragement in building a better world would, it is thought, meet with a warm welcome. Then there remains the compilation of a Roll of Honour of those who have died, and also a Roll of those who have served. With all this work to do we shall welcome at least the full sum for which we have appealed. The total amount received to date is £240.—Yours, &c.,

DEATH AND IMMORTALITY.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—I was constrained to send the article with the title 'Out of the Valley,' as the Friends would say, to testify to one experience more intensive than we usually reveal in public. If it gives rise to an exchange of views I shall be much interested, even if I cannot join in.

Mr. Drummond's interesting letter calls for a short explanation, the omission of which might seem discourteous to one for whom I have a high regard. When I wrote of "three chief types" of attitude towards Death and Immortality I did not mean this division to be exhaustive, or to exclude minor varieties. In particular, the persons included in (c) are not only a vast number but also very miscellaneous in character, ranging from the grossest Epicurean to the loftiest Stoic. Perhaps the Agnostics, on account of their character and influence as well as their numbers, should be treated as a "chief type." But in any precise classification of belief, opinion, hope or attitude on this question, it would be necessary to distinguish between those, on the one hand, who say at once "we neither know nor can know anything about the Future, therefore let us not waste thought about it, but give ourselves up to the Present" (of which, be it said, they often make noble use), and those, on the other hand, who seriously ponder over the subject, neither affirming nor denying, but remaining in a state of suspense. The former belong to my type (c); the latter to a minor type similar to the one to which I myself belong. Mr. Drummond implies that Spiritualism, if authenticated, furnishes the most tangible evidence we have of human survival. Possibly; the point is, is there any intangible evidence on which we can rely? I believe there is.—Yours, &c.,

WORKERS' AID SOCIETY.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—May I remind the members of the above Society that contributions of garments are now due, and should be sent to me at the address given below without delay, so that I may forward the Christmas parcels in good time to Winifred House and the Domestic Missions. I shall gladly welcome new members to the Society. The conditions are two garments a year, and an optional subscription of 6d. to cover expenses.—Yours, &c.,

WAR BONUS TO MINISTERS.

THE Rev. C. J. Street informs us that, following on the joint offer of the Sustentation Fund and the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, 34 ministers will receive a war bonus of £5, 66 of £10, and 18 of £15, making £1100 in all to 118 ministers. It is hoped to send out the cheques well before Christmas.

HOLIDAY AND CONVALESCENT HOMES.

THE Annual Meeting of the General Committee of the Great Hucklow and Blackpool Holiday and Convalescent Homes was held at Great Hucklow on Friday and Saturday of last week. The chair was taken by Mr. H. J. Broadbent, and there were present delegates representing the Sunday School Association, the Manchester District Sunday School Association, and the various district Sunday School Unions co-operating in the management of the Homes. During the year a fourth Home has been established, as our readers are aware, viz., the Florence Nightingale Convalescent Home for ex-soldiers and sailors. This Home has been established by a National Committee as a National War Memorial to the men of our communion who fell in the war, and for practical purposes its management has been associated with the existing group of Holiday and Convalescent Homes pending the formation of a National Homes Association. The new Home is at present housed in temporary premises, and an appeal is about to be made for a permanent establishment and endowment. It was reported that the cumulative period spent by guests in the four Homes during the year had, so far, reached the high total of 1,996 weeks, being an average of over 38 guests in the Homes every week throughout the year. In this total are included children from the Sale Industrial School and the Nicholl's Hospital, together with several companies of Girl Guides: but more than 1,400 of the guests were from our own schools and congregations. The income of the four Homes, apart from the Special Fund for the War Memorial Home, amounted to £1,320, and this, together with £80 derived from subscriptions, school collections and profits on the central wholesale stores would suffice to meet the total expenditure of the four Homes during the year. At Great Hucklow the Committee have a central bakery in which, it was stated, over 8,000 loaves had been baked during the year, besides cakes, &c. The special report on the new War Memorial Home shewed that over £2,000 had been subscribed of which £600 had been spent in the purchase and equipment of temporary premises. A very promising report of the way in which the fund for the new Home was being taken up in the schools shewed that a number of schools had promised contributions ranging from £5 to £50, and that they were busy arranging entertainments, collections and other local efforts on its behalf.

THE Rev. E. Turland conducted a service in German last Sunday afternoon for German prisoners of war in Sidbury.

NORTH MIDLAND ASSOCIATION.

THE 54th Annual Meeting of the North Midland Presbyterian and Unitarian Association was held on Tuesday, Nov. 19, at the Old Meeting House, Mansfield. Before luncheon the Executive met and adopted the annual report. Divine Service was held at 2.30, conducted by the Rev. T. P. Spedding, the preacher being Dr. R. F. Rattray whose impressive discourse may be said to have provided the keynote to the proceedings of the day. The Governing Body met at 3.15 and received information respecting the work of the Executive; then followed the business meeting. The President, Mr. J. Harrop White, on taking the chair moved the following resolution, which was seconded by Dr. Rattray and carried, all standing, "That this meeting desires to express its deep sense of thankfulness to God for the victory vouchsafed to righteousness and its hope for a just and permanent peace, it declares its pride in the immediate response of our country to the call to arms in defence of the weak and in obedience to duty, and it records its debt of gratitude to those (especially of our own household of faith) who have laid down their lives in the struggle, whose memory will ever be hallowed in our hearts." In proposing the resolution the President observed that they were profoundly thankful that the struggle had ended in the triumph of righteousness and justice. Might they now feel the responsibility resting on them for such a moulding of the destinies of our country and the world, as would not only secure a real and lasting peace, but would avoid any recurrence of so terrible a war.

The Rev. H. S. Tayler as secretary (pro tem.) then read the roll call, and the treasurer, Mr. Bowerman, presented the balance sheet. The President moved the Committee's Report which includes a letter from the late energetic secretary, the Rev. J. Ballantyne, who is now engaged in missionary enterprise in Liverpool, giving details of the work of the "During the War" Committee. "The peculiar and heartening fact is," he says, "that at a time when church work is beset with difficulties of many kinds, the horizon for our group of churches in the North Midlands is bright and full of promise—as witness the marked progress at Hinckley, Newark, and Northampton, where there are all the signs of revival and religious advance." He refers sympathetically to the death of Mr. W. Godfrey, of Mansfield, who had served on the Executive for 23 years, and had been Hon. Treasurer of the North Midland Sunday School Association for nearly 20, and Mr. Benjamin Dowson, of Nottingham and Upper Broughton, a Vice-President of the Association and for many years an ardent supporter of its cause. "To these names on the roll of the faithful dead must be added several of the younger members of the families closely connected with us, who have surrendered their lives willingly for the liberation of the world." The Executive received, early in 1918, a request from the Sheffield and District Union that they should appoint several members to a joint committee of the Union and the North Midland Association for the consideration of possible co-operation in the future, and this suggestion was readily agreed to in the hope that from it might spring much successful missionary enterprise in happier days. The Report ends on a strong note of hopefulness, pointing out the great responsibility and also the great opportunity which lie before the churches.

Mr. Harrop White in moving the adoption of the annual reports emphasised the growing volume of opinion which tended to confirm the principles that had been affirmed in Dr. Rattray's sermon that afternoon. He illustrated this by a reference to a review in The Nation of recent volumes dealing with French war activities, and to a remarkable sermon preached in Mansfield on Mayor's Sunday recently by an Anglican vicar. From facts of this kind he drew the conclusion that there were opportunities before our small group of churches greater than ever before, and he urged that though a feeble folk, like the conies, we should put forth such strength as we certainly possessed, and advance to the future with desire to meet the needs of our time.

Mr. J. C. Warren, in seconding, said our future was not to be gained by any want of definiteness on our part, nor by "cosmopolitanism" in religion or religious teaching, nor by imitating the ritual and practices of other churches; but by honesty and straightforwardness in the teaching of the doctrines we believe to be true.

Mr. W. D. Fritchley moved and the Rev. W. M. Long seconded a vote of thanks to the officers, who were reappointed. Mr. Geo. Bryan moved and Mr. Gallimore seconded a resolution welcoming the representatives of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association and the Sheffield and District Association. The Rev. T. P. Spedding in the absence of the Rev. C. J. Street replied for the former, and the Rev. John Lee for the latter. The Rev. Kenneth H. Bond moved a hearty vote of thanks to the preacher and supporter and to the Mansfield congregation for their kind and generous hospitality. Notwithstanding the prevalent sickness and other difficulties the meetings were well attended, and a bright, helpful and encouraging spirit permeated the speeches.

After tea, given by the Mansfield friends, the result of the ballot for places on the Executive Committee was declared, and the co-opted members duly chosen.

THE RELIGIOUS MOTIVE IN WOMAN'S WORK.

THE Free Church League is holding a useful series of afternoon conferences, which, we believe, many thoughtful women—and some men—are finding very helpful at the present time. The world is entering upon a new era, and it is surely no accident that a proper recognition of women's responsibilities as citizens should have been accorded at the dawn of what may prove to be the most wonderful period in the world's history; but the situation, though full of promise, also has its dangers, and we welcome every effort that is being made to deepen the religious consciousness of those who will shortly for the first time be able to bring direct influence to bear upon national policy. The League seeks to emphasise the spiritual aspect of social reconstruction and to foster the growth of internationalism, and the speakers at its conferences seem to be dealing with their subjects in a courageous and stimulating manner which must open up fresh avenues of thought for many of their hearers. At the meeting last week the new conception of God which is at work in the world to-day, and to which women are contributing so much, was discussed, and it was interesting to notice with what close attention the addresses were followed, and what intelligent interest was brought to bear upon the subject when questions were asked afterwards.

Mrs. Ford Smith, in a most sympathetic way, without attempting to "theologise," sought to express and allow for the growing scepticism lurking in the minds of many for whom the war has proved a shattering disillusionment. But she was able to show, by the force of personal conviction based on experience that, in spite of all that has been endured in the past four years, the beneficent power of God the Father is as real in the world as the sunshine which warms and cheers us, and that it is only by an intense realisation of, and yielding up of ourselves to this influence—which we can surely feel though it is impossible either to grasp or adequately define it—that we can hope to get the support we need in the days that lie before us.

Miss Tatham's address might almost have been entitled 'The Practice of the Presence of God,' and at a time when so many people appear to be getting off the right track, as it seems to us, by too exaggerated an insistence on individual self-sufficiency and the power of man to work out his own salvation unaided, it rested one to be made to feel that we literally move and have our being in God and God alone, and that upon Him we are truly dependent in the only way that does not destroy individuality or enslave the mind. Both speakers dwelt on the dynamic power of love, and Miss Tatham, in amplifying this aspect of deity, reminded her hearers over and over again that it was only in so far as we could realise the dual nature of God—his motherhood as well as His fatherhood—and liberate the love-forces throughout the world, that we should be able to break down the tyranny of material things, and create those social conditions which we all desire to bring about. God was to be the guide and inspirer of all our actions, the desire to do God's will the leading impulse of our lives, and as we sought "the mind that was in Christ Jesus" it could not but be that war, and every other evil, would be abolished by the spiritual forces before which they could not stand.

Mrs. Wheatley, who was in the chair, in thanking the speakers, alluded to the power of love in dealing with what we are pleased to call "the criminal classes," and her statement that we are learning to dispense with the spirit of condemnation was warmly endorsed by the audience.

It would, we think, be very helpful if such meetings could be held by groups of women with social and religious sympathies in common all over the country. The controversial or sectarian note is not needed and should not be sounded. All that is required in each person attending such conferences is earnestness of purpose and a desire to gain such help and encouragement as shall fit her to do the best work of which she is capable for the glory of God and the benefit of humanity.

ATTENTION is directed to the United Service of Thanksgiving to be held tomorrow evening at the Dutch Church, Austin Friars, at 7 o'clock. The Rev. Henry Gow will give the sermon.

AMONG many interesting candidatures we note that Prof. Gilbert Murray (Liberal) is standing for Oxford University, and the Rev. T. Rhondda Williams (Labour) for Cambridge borough.

AT the meeting which is to be held at Kingsway Hall on Tuesday, December 3, to consider the need of creating a universal Christian Conscience in face of the problem of International Reconstruction, the chair will be taken at 5 P.M. by Lord Parmoor, and the speakers will be the Dean of Worcester, Principal Garvie, and Dr. Henry Hodgkin.

SOCIAL RECONSTRUCTION.

THE Y.M.C.A. Lancashire Divisional Council has just issued a series of four articles in pamphlet form by the Rev. H. H. Johnson on 'Principles of Social Reconstruction' (price 3d.) embodying a good deal of material which has already appeared in THE INQUIRER and which we heartily commend to a wider circle of readers. Mr. Johnson's conception of democracy is thoroughly sound and bracing, but in looking to a future in which democracy must come to its own he does not minimise the dangers it will have to encounter before the goal is reached—dangers often of its own making which may result from the impetuosity of its advance or its concentration on purely material aims. He sees clearly that Christianity, with its vision of the Eternal and its insistence on the two worlds to which man belongs, is the only stabilising force that can rescue us from the despair to which an earthly millenium, offering nothing beyond itself, might bring us. "Every noble effort, therefore, in the direction of social reform and human betterment, and indeed every helpful and loving human relationship and activity, not only contribute the present satisfaction which makes life worth living but are also important and never-to-be-neglected factors for all soul-growth." It is only, in short, in so far as we realise that we are building for a world to come that we shall be able to create here "the Christian world, which no man knows as yet." This little pamphlet ought to be of great use to many who are trying to steer a straight course amid the insurgent emotions and the welter of politics which are the aftermath of war.

NOTES ON SOME RECENT BOOKS.

[A short Notice in this column does not preclude a review in a later issue.]

L. H. B. JOYOUS SORROW. London, Constable & Co. 155 pp., 4s. n.

A notice of this book appeared in our columns last week.

Choudry (P. M.). GOD AND MAN. Calcutta: the Banerjee Press. 175 pp.

The Rev. P. M. Choudry, who is a missionary of the Brahmo Samaj, delivered the six lectures published in this book in connection with the anniversaries of that religious body in India, and they were first published in 'The World and the New Dispensation.' Mr. Choudry writes with all the fervour of a loving and devout spirit intent on eternal realities, and whether he quotes from the religious teachers of India or from the utterances of Christ, the goal he aims at and towards which he seeks to urge his fellow countrymen is the same—communion with God and the realisation of His Kingdom in the heart.

Crooker (Joseph H.). THE WINNING OF RELIGIOUS LIBERTY; with appendixes. Boston, Mass. The Beacon Press. i-xiv—1-269 pp., $1.50; by mail, $1.60.

A new book of Dr. Crooker's hardly needs any word of recommendation from us among those acquainted with the writings of leading Unitarians in America, but the special appropriateness at the present time of this brief account of the great achievement of the Pilgrims, and their influence in shaping the destinies of the American Commonwealth, may be pointed out. The progress of religious liberty during the past five hundred years is a fascinating study, and Dr. Crooker has given us an excellent summary of it and of the contribution of America to the working out of the great ideal of freedom.

Demos. THE MEANING OF RECONSTRUCTION. London, Allen & Unwin. i-iii—1-75 pp., 2s. 6d. n.

In this able series of essays, reprinted from The Athenæum at the request of numerous readers, an attempt is made to discuss the fundamental purpose of Reconstruction. The writer clearly sees that unless we fully understand what our national aim should be, and arrive at "a sufficiently coherent ideal and policy embodying the principles of justice and freedom" for which, on our side, the war has been fought, the mere creation of machinery will be useless. In these days of cheap paper and bad type it is a pleasure to handle a book so tastefully produced and so well printed, quite apart from its intrinsic merits as a contribution to a subject of supreme importance at the present time.

Frazer (Sir James George). FOLK-LORE IN THE OLD TESTAMENT: studies in comparative religion, legend, and law; three volumes, London, Macmillan & Co. i-xxv—1-569 pp., i-xxi—1-571 pp., i-xviii—1-566 pp., 37s. 6d. n.

In these three volumes Sir James Frazer has used his unrivalled knowledge of folk-lore and the customs of primitive peoples to elucidate many of the early stories of the Old Testament. It is divided into four parts. Part I. 'The Early Ages of the World,' including the Creation, the Flood, and the Tower of Babel. Part II. 'The Patriarchal Age,' dealing specially with the stories of Abraham and Jacob and Joseph's divining cup. Part III. 'The Times of the Judges and the Kings,' including chapters on the Exodus, Samson, the Witch of Endor, Solomon, Elijah and the Ravens, Sacred Oaks and Terebinths, and the High Places of Israel. Part IV. 'The Law.' The author points out that his special line of study has obliged him to dwell chiefly on the traces of savagery and superstition which are to be found in the Old Testament. "But to do so," he adds, "is not to ignore, far less to disparage, that higher side of the Hebrew genius which has manifested itself in a spiritual religion and a pure morality, and of which the Old Testament is the imperishable monument." These three volumes, which will justly be regarded as the most important contribution to the study of Hebrew origins in recent years, are uniform in style with the last edition of 'The Golden Bough.'

Hastings (James), D.D., ed. DICTIONARY OF THE APOSTOLIC CHURCH: vol. 2, MACEDONIA—ZION; with indexes. Edinburgh, T. & T. Clark. 724 pp., 25s. n.

This volume, to which a notable array of scholars and divines have contributed, includes an article of twenty pages on 'Paul,' by Dr. Stalker; 'The Resurrection of Christ,' by the Rev. J. M. Shaw; 'Righteousness' and 'War' (both of special interest at the present time) by Dr. James Moffat; 'Temperance,' by the Rev. Donald Mackenzie; 'Persecution,' by the Rev. T. Lewis; and 'Marriage,' by Dr. A. J. Maclean.

Mackenzie (J. S.), Litt.D., LL.D. OUTLINES OF SOCIAL PHILOSOPHY; with appendixes. London, Allen & Unwin. 280 pp., 10s. 6d. n.

The author explains that this book may be regarded as taking the place of his 'Introduction to Social Philosophy,' which has been out of print for a long time, though its scope and plan are considerably different from those of the earlier work. His object has been to provide a suitable text-book of the subject, a rather difficult matter in view of the numbers of people of all ages and at all stages of preparation who are studying it. It deals in a most interesting and instructive manner with 'The Foundations of Social Order,' 'The National Order,' and the 'World Order,' and concludes with an appendix giving comments on Plato's 'Republic.'

Shakespeare (The Rev. J. H.), M.A. THE CHURCHES AT THE CROSS-ROADS; with appendixes. London, Williams & Norgate. 226 pp., 7s. 6d. n.

This is a very readable book and should have much influence on the Nonconformist Churches to which it is chiefly addressed. It displays effectively the deplorable overlapping of chapels among the sects, and appeals to a more practical policy of combination. More encouraging symptoms are described, leading to the hope that the Evangelical Free Churches will "federate" ere long. The author does not shrink from personal confessions and these render some of his chapters peculiarly touching. Although directed to orthodox dissent in the first place the book is clearly important to Churchmen and others interested in Christian progress.

Sorley (W. R.), Litt.D., LL.D. MORAL VALUES AND THE IDEA OF GOD (Gifford Lectures, 1914 and 1915). Cambridge University Press. 534 pp. index, 16s. n.

Dr. Sorley gave a course of Hibbert Lectures on Metaphysics at Manchester College, Oxford, 1913-14, and their matter has been revised and expanded for delivery at Aberdeen, and later in preparation for the press. Hence we have here a carefully considered statement by one of the most competent of English philosophical authorities on a subject which has assumed the highest importance in recent years, and especially since Bergson's speculations came to the front. What is the real significance of those "values," especially of right and good, from which the human mind cannot free itself? The author explores the subject from all sides, and maintaining the objectivity of values reads in them an indication of the nature of supreme reality. The failure of naturalism, pluralism, and monism to explain the divergence between "the order of existence and the moral order" is exhibited, and a definitely theistic conclusion is advanced.

The Village Priest, and Other Stories from the Russian of Militsina and Saltikov; translated by the Hon. Mrs. Tollemache, and with an introduction by C. Hagberg Wright. London, T. Fisher Unwin. i-xxiii—1-171 pp., 6s. n.

Saltikov is a classic in his own country, and Elena Militsina, Dr. Hagberg Wright tells us, is a living writer who is well known in Russia, but whose name is unfamiliar to English readers. Both of them give expression in this sheaf of short stories to the sympathies and hopes which have animated so many fine spirits in Russia, and which, it seems, must still be frustrated until the evil results of the old régime have worked out to their tragic conclusion. Such tales as 'The Village Priest,' 'Arenushka,' and 'The Old Believer,' with their mingled pathos, irony and tenderness, make one realise the foolishness of some of our generalisations about a country of which we know very little even now. In reading them we find ourselves groping through the mazes of a mentality in many respects entirely different from our own, the chief clue to which is that Christ-like pity which filled good Father Andrew's soul, and is shared by the pure in heart in all countries alike.

Watts (Frank), M.A. ECHO PERSONALITIES. London, Allen & Unwin. 111 pp., 4s. 6d. n.

This excellent little book, which is described as "a short study of the contributions of abnormal psychology towards the solution of some of the problems of normal education," contains much that is valuable for those engaged in training the young. The study of the abnormal as an aid to the understanding of the normal is far more fruitful of results than might have been supposed in the days when the former was supposed to comprise mysterious and unique factors which separated it completely from the latter. The "fundamental similarities" have now been revealed, and it is essential that the educationalist should know how they react upon each other. It is hinted that another volume will deal with the attractive subject of genius and the question suggested by "super-normal mentality."

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Aberdeen.—On Friday evening, November 22, at the Open Platform Club, a very interesting paper, illustrated with carefully chosen lantern slides, was read by Mr. C. Raeburn, on 'Some Peoples and Problems of India.' One problem that demanded the gravest consideration, Mr. Raeburn held, was the abject and chronic poverty of the people. India, with the richest soil in the world, had the poorest population. There were millions who scarcely ever knew what it was to have their hunger satisfied. The death rate caused by famines bore ugly comparison with that caused by the war, the people being carried off, by famine alone, at the average rate of two millions per annum. There was only one way to help India. To give the peoples—70 per cent of whom were illiterate—such an education in practical affairs as would lead them to abandon their antiquated and inefficient methods of irrigating and cultivating the soil. And, as they became ready for it, they should be encouraged to take a greater share of self-government. A vote of thanks to Mr. Raeburn for a very thoughtful and informing paper was moved by the Rev. Henry Dawtreay. On three Sunday evenings in December, commencing December 8, Mr. Dawtreay's discourses at the Unitarian Church will deal with three great tragedies—'Hamlet,' 'Antigone,' and 'Job.'

Birmingham: Old Meeting.—A crucifix, presented by an anonymous donor, for erection in the church has been accepted by the committee, and the Rev. J. W. Lloyd Thomas has referred to its significance in a special sermon.

Bolton.—The congregation of Unity Church is busily preparing to celebrate the Silver Jubilee of the church, the present building having been opened in December, 1893. It is their aim to raise £1,000 as a nucleus of a fund to build a new church. Several previous ministers of Unity Church and Commission Street Chapel have promised to be present and it is hoped that all old and new friends will take the opportunity of manifesting their loyalty to the cause. With the return of her many soldier-members—there are 127 names on the Roll of Honour—the Church looks forward to entering upon a new era of usefulness and prosperity. On New Year's Day and the following day the Sale of Work will be held, with Councillor H. Warburton and the Mayor, Lord Leverhulme, as openers. The Committee hopes to raise over £300 for church purposes.—The Rev. E. Morgan, the minister, has written a letter of greeting to the soldiers connected with the congregation, which the superintendents will enclose in the Christmas parcels. In it he asks for the earnest co-operation of the men in the future work of the church after they have returned.

Croydon.—At the 32nd Annual Meeting of the Croydon Domestic Mission, which was held at Dennett Hall on Saturday, November 16th, the President, Mr. Charles Gane, in the chair, gratifying reports were read of the various institutions connected with the Mission, and the Treasurer recorded a balance in hand of over £188. The Rev. W. W. Chynoweth Pope proposed a resolution of thanks and appreciation to the Rev. Delta Evans, who has inaugurated a Sunday evening service, is taking boys' and girls' classes, and has resuscitated the Band of Hope. Appreciative acknowledgment was made of Mrs. Evans's help at the women's meeting and in other ways. The Rev. Delta Evans, in replying, said he thought that, on the whole, the Committee and subscribers had every reason to be gratified with the amount and quality of the work being carried on in connection with the Mission. He was glad to say that he had not witnessed many cases of carking poverty such as he had seen in other places in the early stages of the war, but he had come in touch with much distress of a different kind—distress such as the cruel war had brought into the homes of the poor and the rich alike. In a quiet, unostentatious way very useful work was being done at Dennett Hall, but there was scope for much more, and now that we might soon expect our brave men back from fighting our battles, with the conditions of life generally changed, the scope for good and reconstructive work there as elsewhere would be enormously widened. He sincerely hoped, therefore, that a suitable man could soon be found who could give more time to the work of the Mission, or, better still, one to give his whole time.

Evesham.—The Rev. H. H. Johnson, minister of the Unitarian Church, has written a Hymn of Victory, which was sung at both services on Sunday. It was also sent out by the Lancashire Division of the Y.M.C.A., in order that it might be sung in all their centres on the same day.

Horsham.—The church Annual Report, lately issued, speaks with appreciation of the services conducted by the minister, the Rev. N. J. Hawthorn Jones. The financial year ends with a small balance in hand. Seven new junior members have been added to the church roll, most of whom were members of the minister's week evening class. Both the Library and Museum Society report favourable progress, and a number of lectures, &c., have been held under their auspices. At a recent church meeting, at the suggestion of Mr. Jones, the Rev. J. J. Marten was asked to accept the title of Minister Emeritus in recognition of his long and valued services as former minister of the church and of the high regard in which he is held by the congregation. A pleasant Social Evening, arranged by Mrs. Jones, Miss Albery, Miss Laker, and Mr. B. Baker, took place on Thursday, Nov. 14, when various items of interest were contributed to the programme by many friends. On Sunday Thanksgiving Services for the conclusion of the war were held, the subject of the sermon in the morning being 'The Lessons of the War,' and 'The League of Nations' in the evening. The Rev. W. G. Tarrant has accepted an invitation to preach the Anniversary sermons next Whit Sunday.

Horwich.—There were record services on Sunday, November 24, at the Unitarian Free Church, on the occasion of the Choir Anniversary, this being the first time the choir has thus been recognised. The Rev. J. Cyril Flower of Bolton preached in the afternoon, and an augmented choir rendered special anthems at both the afternoon and evening services. The latter was conducted by the minister, the Rev. H. Bernard Hannah.

Midland Sunday School Association.—At a Conference of teachers held on November 23 at Hurst Street School, Birmingham, the Rev. Stanley Mossop gave an address on 'The Child and Religion.' The main point of the address was to emphasise the importance of understanding the religious psychology of children if we would hold them for the churches. Some of Mr. Mossop's suggestions for deepening the religious feelings were unfamiliar to many and provoked an interesting discussion. Previous to the address an excellent programme was given by members of the Hurst Street Choir, under the direction of Mr. R. A. Clarke.

Nottingham.—A soiree to welcome the Rev. Simon Jones and his wife to the New Pavement Chapel was held in the schoolroom on Thursday, November 14. It was preceded by a short service in the chapel, conducted by the Rev. Alexander Gordon, under whom Mr. Jones was a student. At the soiree the chair was taken by Mr. Warren, in the absence through illness of Mr. Woolley, Chairman of the Council. Mr. Warren warmly welcomed Mr. and Mrs. Jones and promised them the congregation's hearty support. Mr. J. H. Cooper, Financial Warden of the Chapel, Mr. W. H. Perry, President of the Sunday School, and the Rev. W. A. Long of Christ Church then spoke. Mr. Jones made a most interesting and acceptable speech in reply and was followed by the Rev. A. Gordon, who was as happy and impressive as he always is. There were large and encouraging attendances at both service and soiree.

Oldham.—The Anniversary Services were held at the Unitarian Chapel on Sunday, November 24, and were characterised by the note of thanksgiving for the cessation of hostilities. Specially selected hymns and solos were rendered and the preacher for the day was the Rev. F. Munford of Heywood.—A Bazaar is to be held on April 2, 4, and 5, 1919, with the aim and object of raising £500 or more for decorative and other purposes to chapel and school.

Padiham.—On Saturday, November 16, a social gathering was held to welcome the Rev. J. H. Ewbank, recently appointed minister of the Unitarian Chapel, and Mrs. Ewbank to Padiham. A large number of members and friends assembled. The chair was taken by the President, Mr. F. D. Smith, who gave the welcome on behalf of the congregation. He spoke of the hopes entertained of the new ministry, and felt assured that by the united efforts of minister and congregation those hopes would be realised. Mr. T. W. Waddington, on behalf of the Sunday school, extended to Mr. and Mrs. Ewbank a warm welcome. Mr. G. H. Leigh, J.P., C.C., of Swinton (President of Mr. Ewbank's former church), the Revs. Silas Rixon (Congregational minister), J. S. Langley (Baptist minister), Fred Hall (Blackburn), Frank Coleman (Burnley), J. Pipkin (Colne), Mr. Tom Rowley (Burnley), Mr. J. Cameron (Accrington), and Mrs. Hargreaves (Padiham), also expressed good wishes towards Mr. Ewbank and the church. Mr. and Mrs. Ewbank suitably responded. Letters of apology were read from the Vicar of Padiham and the minister of Cross Bank Wesleyan Church, and from the Rev. A. W. Fox of Todmorden.

The Women's League.—In the Monthly Letter issued by the Women's League reference is made to the visits which have been paid to soldiers and sailors in hospital in various towns by members or friends. It is pointed out, however, that this useful work, which often results in a man's relatives receiving information as to his progress and gives them the assurance that he is being looked after, is somewhat hampered by the fact that addresses are not sent to headquarters as soon as they are received. The friends of wounded men connected with our religious body are urged to let the Local Branch Secretary, or the Secretary in London (Essex Hall, Essex Street, Strand, London, W.C.2) know as soon as they have news of their whereabouts, so that it may be possible for visits to be paid to them by League members without undue delay. It has often happened that, owing to the address being sent in late, the visitor arrives at the hospital only to find that the soldier or sailor she is inquiring for has been removed. The Monthly Letter draws attention, also, to the need for a considerable widening of the woman's outlook, and more serious study of social subjects, in view of her new responsibilities as a voter, and suggests that it would be advantageous if members were to get into touch with other societies interested in these matters such as the Women's Local Government Society, and the National Union of Women Workers. The latter, by its "Women Citizens' Association," is forming centres for study and information in different parts of the country.

Victoria, B.C.—Ten new subscribers have been enrolled at the Unitarian Church, and now, for the first time during its recent history, the monthly income promises to balance the expenditure. "All being well," says the Calendar, "our contributors will have the satisfaction of knowing that we shall be free from the chronic deficit which has hampered our past endeavours."

A prominent educationist writes:—"I have this day finished reading the book by Jules Fiaux, and think it most excellent. Though less pretentious than the books of Payot and others, it covers the ground well, marks out pitfalls with appropriate danger signals, and holds aloft the light of wisdom and common sense above the psychological chasms which await the average and untutored reader."

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

All letters and manuscripts for the Editor should be sent to 13 Bream's Buildings, Fetter Lane, London, E.C.4. They must reach the Editor not later than Wednesday morning for publication the same week.

As the electioneering proceeds there is only too much evidence of a grave danger of decadence in popular aims and ideals regarding the Peace which has now to be formulated, and upon the terms of which the whole future of mankind so largely depends. If we had not the most solemn and deliberate utterances of Mr. Lloyd George, Mr. Balfour, and other men who are obviously marked out to take a decisive part in the international deliberations we might be dismayed lest, after all the sacrifices and aspirations of these awful years of war, the most fatal of mistakes was about to be made. It is rumoured that the new Parliament will not meet till the Conference is well on its way; if that is actually contemplated the reason possibly is that such men, knowing well their vast responsibilities, really do not wish to be too much influenced by the torrid appeals of the successful candidates. Of course we know that the Government said it desired to feel it had the confidence of the country as it went into the Conference; but we think politicians have no difficulty in understanding that sort of language.

AMONG the groups of public men who have felt it their duty to address us just now on subjects of paramount interest, we notice two which have no relation to the rival political programmes—if, indeed, there are any rivals. A number of distinguished scientists have issued a weighty appeal that the use of poisonous gases should be absolutely forbidden by the Peace Conference; and those of us who know anything of the horrible results of this weapon can only wish that the deeply solemn warning of these learned men may be heard. But, we are inclined to say, if the Peace Conference does not result in such a combination as shall prevent war itself in any form whatever, a barbarity more or less will hardly matter. We must stop the horrid business altogether, or, as Lord Grey says, perish.

THE other manifesto to which we allude is that of the leaders of the inter-denominational temperance union, with the Archbishop of Canterbury at their head, earnestly pleading that the restrictions imposed on the trade in alcoholic drinks shall be substantially maintained during the demobilisation period, and that there shall not be a return to the ante-war laxity on the subject. This matter we hold to be of the gravest importance. There is some fear lest a certain degree of popular reaction may take place, in which the less reputable elements in the working-class districts will clamour for their old "liberty." We are assured, on the other hand, that a revival of the former regulations is "unthinkable" to the men who have been controllers of the trade of late, and who presumably will be in authority for some time yet. All intelligent persons will strengthen this attitude of theirs as much as possible.

* * *

THE venerable Dr. Percival, formerly Bishop of Hereford, has passed away full of years and honours, such as are paid by lovers of liberty, charity, and faithful service of the higher life of man. True, he was excommunicated by the Bishop of Kikuyu; but when we remember that in 1860, over a score of bishops, headed by the two archbishops, heartily condemned the writers of 'Essays and Reviews,' one of whom yet lived to become Archbishop of Canterbury, it is probable that Dr. Percival was not much troubled by that portentous treatment. For his part he was evidently too good a Christian to excommunicate anybody who wished to join in Christian work. He got on very well with all kinds of Dissenters, inviting them at the coronation service in his cathedral to share in the Lord's Supper. We have even known Unitarians to be quite happy in his fellowship. Suppose not one only but a score of bishops to be of his fine mental calibre and wide spiritual sympathies—what might not the Church then become!

WE are very glad to say that Capt. Harold Pearson, one of the directors of THE INQUIRER Company, and Secretary of the Sustentation Fund, who has been a war prisoner in German hands since early in the summer has been released, and reached home on Sunday morning, in London, after a somewhat trying journey of twelve days. Capt. Pearson, who is in fair health, says that the conditions at the camp where he was interned and his treatment as a prisoner were not seriously to be complained of. While his many friends will congratulate him on his safe return, there will be much sympathy with him on the death of his father, Mr. C. Fellows Pearson, before his return.

* * *

PRIVATE correspondence confirms, unhappily, the published stories of German inhumanity to prisoners. A V.A.D., writing from a French hospital, says: "M—— said there were about 180 Sherwoods altogether some six kilos behind the German lines working under our shell-fire, and if we sent gas over they just had to endure it, as they had no gas masks or protection. He said they were 'fair clemmed' (though it is fair to say the Germans seem to have been so too). If it had not been for the French civilians, who would share anything with them, very few would have got through the time alive. He was with about 300 others when the news of the armistice came, and the guards got them together to march them further inland towards Germany. They refused to go and made their way as best they could towards our lines. They had to leave more than half the men behind as they were too ill to walk, and too weak. One man died just as they got near our lines. Wasn't it horrible? They had received no parcels from home since March (when they were taken). They heard they were in Germany, but the Germans would not send them up the line to them. One boy did receive a parcel, and opened it and found three biscuits inside—exquisite cruelty—everything else had been stolen." It is announced that the German authorities will punish those guilty of this barbarism. We shall see.

To the many indications already given of the sense of need for a radical re-statement of religious belief may be added one that reaches us from an officer who has been two years in France, and who, despite the horrors and problems of the war speaks of them as "two of the happiest years of a very happy and healthy life." Brought up at the feet of leading Presbyterian divines he has gradually come to hold a type of faith little different from that of Unitarians generally. He says: "The Church seems to have fallen absolutely flat with us here, and from numerous conversations I know many are seeking clear leadership and a Church to go to. I cannot feel that the Catholic Churches are yet ripe for the great change they will have to undergo to meet the wants of these men. Mental and spiritual fields have lain fallow these last years, and there is a feeling that there is a danger of bad ideas taking root. The next few months are going to be by far the most important and difficult for us all." The significance of such thoughtful words will be obvious to every zealous adherent of our liberal churches.

THE portrait of the late Rev. Charles Hargrove, D.Litt., painted by Miss Minna Tayler, to which allusion was made in these columns shortly after his death, has been purchased, framed and presented to Essex Hall where it now adorns the American Room at the Hall, adding among the goodly array of portraits in black and white a welcome touch of colour. A characteristic smile shows in the eyes and recalls one whose genial humour lit up the intense interests of his life. The donors are past-presidents and members of the executive committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. Through the generosity of the artist the Belgian Fund benefits by the price of the picture.

HALCYON DAYS.

How mild comes in the first full month of Peace!

After October, riotous, tempest-tost,
And keen November, rimed with frost
on frost,

Behold December brings a mellow breeze Charged with the gathered warmth of southern seas,

That seems of Spring herself the harbinger:

You scarce would know the season of the year,

But for the naked lattice of the trees,
And sundown at this hour. And as in days

When death still stalked the earth,
the heart would turn,

In some brief lull, to half-forgotten ways
Of quietness that men again should learn,

So now the thrush pours out his melody
For spring that was, and spring that yet shall be.

THAT MILLION HOUSES.

IN the haze, not to say fog, of more or less specious promises and suggestions by would-be legislators it is a relief to come close to something definite and solid. Such a thing is presented in the demand of the Labour Party that a million houses should be erected without more delay than the magnitude of the work renders inevitable. This demand probably staggers some minds, and if it staggers them awake to the facts lying at the back of it so much the better. Every social reformer is well aware, painfully aware, of these facts; and, if the public at large has this long while slumbered selfishly on, it has not been for lack of warning voices. Before the war, long before, the cry arose again and again, from city and village alike, that there was "no room to live." It was literally true that workers and their families often could not get a roof to dwell under within any reasonable distance of their work. Hardships and worries unimaginable by most of us were the continual experience of thousands. And in many cases where, by pushing and entreating, and especially by paying, the worker did manage to get some sort of a shelter, it was notoriously inadequate to the needs of decent life; indeed, for hapless multitudes it was inadequate for any life whatever.

The figures of a census are cold symbols, unattractive, if not unintelligible, to the mind of most readers of newspapers; and the speaker who deals in percentages knows well how soon an audience is bored with them. The bitter, agonising truth about it all is that these figures represent lives; that every unit in the dreary total of nearly three millions of our people who live more than two to a room is just as entitled to human rights as any of us, that the babies who die off by thousands in the slums are an invaluable part of the nation's vital wealth, and that the men and women who have to huddle together in such crowded squalor are (so sweet religion says) children of Our Father in Heaven. Well may the Bishop of London warn his respectable fellow-countrymen that if these things go on as they have done for years past our nation's reputation amongst the rest for "hypocrisy," will be impossible to repudiate.

How the houses are to be built, the finance of the subject, the order, and the art side of it, our would-be legislators must study out, and that quickly. A candidate, of considerable Parliamentary standing, said the other day that getting the people "back to the land" was "a large subject"—and there he left it. If we understand the temper of our Labour friends that kind of fatuity will be relegated to its proper place very soon. Who can wonder at their impatience! The real wonder is that the people who have endured so long have endured so patiently. This planning and providing is undoubtedly a large business, but—the reflection, though already trite, is inevitable—so was the war. The nation managed that; it must manage this. All our hope of prosperity is bound up in it—our health, economy, efficient industry, morals. It is not a question of whether, seeing how huge our public debts are, we can afford it; the simple truth is that we cannot afford not to do it. And if a misgiving arises that a deplorably large number of the submerged population is pretty certain soon to "slumify" any share of the new houses they may get, the counter-reflections must occur to any thoughtful person—first, that if these people are so horrid in their habits their actual daily and nightly surroundings all this while must be taken into account, and the responsibility fastened upon those who actively or passively helped slums to develop, rural as well as urban; and, secondly, that the one chance of their becoming more decent in their ways is to give them more room for decency. The churches, above all, have an urgent interest in this subject. Where is the sense of providing "domestic" missions for the poor, if we neglect or scant the provision of a proper human home-life for them!

There must be no mistake about this matter. The shortage before the war was scandalous; the stoppage of building operations—except in special areas—during the war has rendered it ominous in the extreme, and the need of rousing the public mind on the subject—or must we say the legislators?—received significant illustration in the justly rejected proposals recently brought before the House of Commons. But perhaps a new House will show itself more competent to supply new houses—by the million. Anything less will be insufficient for the actual needs of to-day; tomorrow's needs, once this reform is carried out, may be more confidently entrusted to the better type of civilisation that will be created under happier home conditions than now prevail.

THE service of St. Saviour's, Southwark, in commemoration of the baptism in that church of John Harvard, founder of the American University which bears his name, was also in commemoration of Fellows of Harvard who had given their lives in the war. Among the latter was Lionel de Jersey Harvard, a graduate of Harvard, and the only graduate bearing the name of the founder, who was killed at Arras while serving as a captain in the Grenadier Guards.

THERE are to-day, says the election manifesto of the Strength of Britain Movement, more people in favour of the Prohibition of the Liquor Traffic than ever before in our history. Yet at this time the Ministry of Food has just forbidden millers to purchase barley to make bread and the farmers are being bribed to sell their barley to the brewers by an offer of 3s. per quarter added to the standard rate. The Movement urges that the policy of utilising the distilleries for the production of industrial alcohol (for this purpose growing potatoes or beet upon the land) to produce a non-intoxicating beer at breweries, and to transform mere drink shops into people's cafés, social clubs, national kitchens, infants' welfare centres, or other places of real recreation, refreshment or utility would strengthen to an immense degree the economic and moral resources of the nation. Supporters of the Movement are being urged to support at the forthcoming election candidates favourable to Prohibition, and to sign the Electoral Covenant, copies of which can be obtained at 175, Piccadilly, W.

A UNITED SERVICE OF THANKSGIVING.

THE Thanksgiving Service arranged by the London District Unitarian Society, which was held last Sunday evening at the fine old Dutch Church, Austin Friars, of which Dr. de la Faille is the minister, was very well attended, and the large screened-off space in which the congregation is gathered round the canopied pulpit in square, old-fashioned pews, was crowded. Many familiar faces were seen, and one would imagine that the congregations in those churches in and around London which had not suspended their evening service for this occasion must have been greatly diminished. Boy Scouts once more rendered assistance by directing strangers to Austin Friars, and as these were furnished with large placards, in addition to accurate information as to the number of lamp-posts you had to pass before reaching the proper turning, nobody had any excuse for missing the way. The Dutch Church is not very easy to find, but fortunately we were not obliged to grope along unlighted streets in search of it, and Londoners know how to appreciate the cheerful illumination which enables them to go about at night-time in safety, and makes it possible to hold these fraternal gatherings as in pre-war days.

The service, which was conducted very impressively by the Rev. J. A. Pearson, opened with the hymn to which all hearts were attuned, 'O God, our help in ages past.' It was taken rather too slowly, but everybody sang with fervour, and the pealing notes of the organ sounded with great effect among the old gray walls and lofty arches. All the hymns had been well chosen, and surely never before had the appeal of George Matheson's 'O Love that will not let me go' been charged with deeper emotion, or the majestic lines of Kipling's 'Recessional' with such striking and really wonderful significance. The lesson was taken from Isaiah xl., and Revelation xxi.—passages so laden with beauty and so full of trust in the eternal God that they seemed fitly to sum up the deep feeling of thankfulness which the service was intended to make articulate. It was left for the preacher, however, the Rev. Henry Gow, to translate into modern language that supreme message of faith; and to show how it is possible for us to create the new heaven and the new earth which the prophet foretold when the former things had passed away.

THE SERMON.

After a brief reference to the war and the victory which was signalled last month, Mr. Gow reminded his hearers that they had all been bought with a price, that they were not their own, and, faced as they were with tremendous problems, they wanted to dedicate themselves anew to the service of God and of humanity. There were great dangers ahead, both of reaction and excess, of tyranny and revolution; there were bitter antagonisms to meet, and many obstacles to lasting peace to overcome; but they were looking out upon this changed life with a deep, confident faith in God, in great ideals, and in the possibility of realising them. What were the justifications for this faith that was moving their hearts to-day? Two things had happened beyond all doubt: the long agony of the past four-and-a-half years was over, and their young men were no longer required to do what their soul abhorred on behalf of right. Though they were living in a world half in ruins, and some had gone who would never return, while for others the coming of peace held out no hope of the assuagement of their sufferings, we had been saved from a deadly peril, which, if it had not been checked, would have put an end to our national liberties and would have well-nigh destroyed civilisation. His faith in God did not prevent him from saying that all this might have been; but it did not happen, and, instead, right had triumphed and wrong had been overthrown.

Yet this did not give them the justification they sought for their faith in the possibility of creating a new heaven and earth. So long as they regarded what had happened as a great storm or fire which had raged over Europe and wrought tremendous damage, they could thank God that it had passed, and prepare, like the Jews returning from their exile, to build up the old waste places and renew the former desolation. They might, at most, expect to repair, to rebuild, to reconstruct—to get back to where they were before the storm broke. But this did not express the temper of our time. They were all talking about reconstruction, but they did not mean by that restoration. They meant regeneration, re-creation and redemption. Not one of them wished to go back to just what we were before the war, both internationally and here in England. They would all feel it was disloyalty to their dead, to aim at the restoration of things as they were. They believed in the possibility of something much more than this, and they thanked God most in thanking him at that time for the great ideals, for the hopes of international peace, of social justice and a deeper knowledge of religious truth in the hearts of men which were now filling their minds and inspiring their efforts. They felt on their brows an air of the morning, a breath from the springs of the East.

The real justification of their faith, the speaker continued, was the atoning sacrifice of their young men which had revealed to them the divine depths of love. Men in countless thousands had died for them, but to feel that deeply and rightly was not only to thank God, or even to desire to be more worthy of them: it was to be conscious of a new strength, a new courage, and greater power to realise their ideals. It was to feel as St. Paul did in regard to the death of Christ. The two great doctrines of Christianity which Christians ignored at their peril were the doctrine of the Incarnation and the Atonement. The Incarnation meant that God was most like the highest human love and goodness, though infinitely above it, and that we came nearest to God when we thought of these two things. They were right, he believed, in keeping quite clear the distinction between Jesus and God, and in not worshipping Christ as God; but so far as we thought of Jesus as the highest and best of men we were right in thinking of him as revealing God most truly in our hearts and minds. The Atonement meant essentially not a change of mind and will in God as the result of Christ's death or the death of anybody, but a restraining and unifying power in men's lives. Sacrifice was not merely a model or pattern which we were called upon to imitate: it was something done for us, and if they felt it aright it gave them power and insight, not merely right motives for right doing. The latter were always innumerable as the stars; it was the power to act which was wanting. This power only the consciousness of being one with our loved ones in their death and in their victory, and a full realisation of the divine meaning of their sacrifice, would give us. The thought of them would fill us with invincible hope; they would help us to make our dreams come true. As the early Christians used to look upon the Cross, and cry "In this thou shalt conquer," so we, as we took up our burdens in the coming days, could say "with them and through them we shall conquer."

The service was brought to a close by the singing of 'God bless our native land.'

MANCHESTER COLLEGE, OXFORD.

II.

GRATITUDE and wonder, these are perhaps the two overmastering impressions which the student bears away with him from the second successful session which has now drawn to a close—gratitude to the College Committee, Principal, and staff, whose generous enterprise brought the Minister's School into being, and wonder that so many ministers should seem indifferent to its significance and value as an inspiring help to them in their work. For forty days, led by expert guides, we travelled through realms of gold, and to learn that the authorities were not besieged and overwhelmed with applications is to feel, like the prophet of old, as one astounded.

There is a virtue about a Ministers' School which vitalises a jaded spirit as no other gathering of ministers can. It brings closely together, as teachers and learners, men differing sharply in taste and talent. The friendly clash of intellect in discussion, the give and take of individual experience, and, withal, the strongly felt bond of sympathy create a life-giving atmosphere, and the hardest task becomes a thing to delight in.

Happy were the men who contrived to remain over the week-ends to attend Public Worship in the College Chapel. It is a soul-stirring experience. The solemn beauty of the service and the sublime music of organ and choir make the heart burn within and the old words come once again: "Surely, the Lord is in this place; this is none other but the house of God, and this is the gate of heaven."

A more than ordinary significance was lent to the proceedings by the signing of the Armistice on November 11. This momentous event renders the School memorable by imparting a new urgency to the vast problems of Settlement and Reconstruction. We were able to hear what the best minds had to say about the best ways of making our churches a potent help in forming the conditions which alone can ensure the peace of the world. Truly, the School met in a fortunate hour.

Particularly valuable were the evening conferences, which owing to their catholicity provided suitable opportunities for those conversations the situation demanded. A glance at the subjects will indicate the ground freely ranged over: Churches and Social Welfare, Ethical Problems of Internationalism, Town Mission Work, Is the Life of a Unitarian Minister Worth While? and Samuel Butler's Life and Teaching. Furthermore, distinguished visitors came in from the University. Dr. Macan, the Master of University College, made an enthusiastic statement of the case for Spelling Reform, F. F. Urquhart of Balliol spoke on the Mediæval Mind, and Dr. Ottley of Christ Church delivered a beautiful address on Devotion. Especially interesting was the Rev. Henry Gow's story of his experiences among our soldiers in France.

The programme of lectures, unusually wide in scope, was admirably planned, and the subjects so co-related as to leave on the mind a strong impression of the singleness of aim pursued throughout the whole syllabus.

The Master of University College gave a comprehensive survey of the chief epochs of Greek history and made that ancient civilisation live before us. Hellas, he contended, was not a geographical term but the symbol of a community life which originated in Crete and gradually spread until it embraced the whole of the Mediterranean regions.

This formed an excellent background for Professor Murray's fascinating lectures on Religion in the Greek Dramatists. His exposition of certain judiciously selected Greek terms revealed in a new light what was destructive in the thought of the Greeks and put it in line with the fundamental ideas of religion everywhere. In this way we were enabled more justly to appreciate the immortal teaching of the divine Plato whose doctrine of the soul was the theme of two eloquent lectures by Dr. Stanley Mellor.

Owing to Mr. Gow's recent absence in France New Testament Study was in charge of Dr. Carpenter, and his interpretation of the character of the Fourth Gospel bore all the marks of ripe learning and insight which might be expected of this great and much revered scholar. Dr. Carpenter also lectured on the 'Doctrine of Life after Death in the Religion of India,' and opportunity was thus given us to take advantage of his wide researches in this fertile field. In the Old Testament, the Rev. D. C. Simpson took as his subject, 'Some Selected Psalms,' and skilfully dealing with their origin, structure, and character created the atmosphere in which they found shape and led us to discover the Psalms anew. Supplementary were the lectures delivered by the Rev. J. W. Weatherall on (1) 'The Prophets in the Light of To-day,' and (2) 'The Psalter.' Mr. Weatherall insisted that religion, not social reform, was the concern of the prophets and ethical monotheism their great contribution to the world. The true test of a religion, he maintained, lay in its power to express itself in song, and Israel's answer was to be found in the Psalter the spirit of which was the spirit of exultant rapture in the presence of God.

English Literature occupied an important place in the programme. Is this the first time that our Classics have gained recognition in a Theological School? If so, it is to be hoped that it will not prove the last. Mr. Gow lectured with penetrating insight on Shakespearean Tragedy and Milton. A certain virile optimism, which characterises all Mr. Gow's utterances, acts like a tonic on all who have the joy of hearing him.

The Rev. R. H. U. Bloor, who followed, discussed (1) 'The English Novel,' and (2) 'Good and Evil in the Poetry of Shelley and Byron.' Mr. Bloor revels in his subject and his brilliant addresses made us feel how glorious a realm was literature to travel in. Dr. Rattray guided us with sure step through unfamiliar fields. His lectures on the 'Influence of the Plastic Arts on the History of Religion' enlarged our horizon and gave us a glimpse of many unthought of things. Philosophy was not neglected. A critical dissertation on Pragmatism was presented by the Rev. J. C. Homer.

Principal Jacks applied his logical and constructive intellect to the question of the Law and we shall not be surprised if his deliverances on the 'Doctrine and Method of Peace' were to prove epoch-making. Theories of peace we have in abundance, but they have failed to mature for lack of a business method. This method Dr. Jacks supplies. Briefly, it is National Insurance against War based on the principle of bearing one another's burdens. The whole mass of war indebtedness must be placed under International management and full powers vested in a Board of Trustees chosen by the peoples concerned. It is the formation of a World Friendly Society implying international control of war finance from which follows control of the whole situation. Dr. Jacks's scheme is full of extraordinary promise, and if accorded a fair trial would give to the League of Nations a predominately industrial orientation and strengthens the motives to peace as it weakens the motives to war.

MONTHLY NOTES.

As soon as the Armistice was announced, and I knew the hospitals would not be receiving any more wounded my thoughts were occupied with the future of this Fund. This last month has been as busy as any since the beginning, but the most lightly wounded men are leaving hospital now and each week sees a sensible diminution in the number of patients. It seemed desirable, therefore, to arrange that the subscription lists should close at the end of the present year. This does not mean that the work will cease. It will go on as long as it is wanted, but I hope the funds which we trust to receive during this last month will provide sufficient money to carry on for some months. I should like to ask our regular supporters if they will not commute their subscriptions, which I believe they were prepared to continue for some time, into a final donation at the end of this month.

I should like to give some idea of my plans for the future. The hut at Calais is to go on, as long as the Belgian base is there, and even beyond, as soldiers will be passing to and fro for some time. It is further proposed to keep it open to feed the returning refugees from France, as the refugee trains generally stop some hours at Calais and our hut is only about five minutes walk from the station. Mme. Lageot, the directrice of our maternity home, is entrusted with the supervision of the arrangements for these refugees passing through Calais, and as her husband is the director of the hut, it will all fit in well together. We have already sent out a store of clothing to Calais, and Mme. Lageot makes up a parcel for each soldier passing through the hut and going to his home in Belgium, according to the number and ages of his family. When the hut is of no further use, the wood and equipment will probably be sold and the money applied to repatriation work in Belgium.

The maternity home at Calais is very busy now and will remain as long as there are patients. It is proposed to use the equipment to form a "clinique enfantine" in some Belgian town, under Mme. Lageot's supervision—a sort of school for mothers and child welfare—where the children can be cared for and the mothers can bring their babies for advice. I believe this sort of institution will be a real necessity among the people who have been starving under German rule, as accounts show that the children have suffered greatly and will need a great deal of care and building up, if they are to become healthy again.

As for the hospitals, each one expects to be moved back next week, but it is fairly clear that it will be some months before all are at home again. Of course, the convalescents can return at once to their homes, so I expect the convalescent depots will vanish first. I know that every effort is being made to send everyone home as quickly as possible, but it will take time. I am anxious to keep in touch with the hospitals until they are either suppressed or are settled in permanent institutions, and it is the disabled that call out one's warmest sympathy for the future. I hope to be able to do something for them, and especially for the tuberculous and the paralysed—as I have all along been keenly interested in them. It is impossible to state definitely what form the permanent memorial of our work should take, but, as certain people have thought we proposed something ornamental, I may say that what I had in mind was something of the nature of an open air balcony ward for the tuberculous—or some installation of a remedial nature.

I have arranged with the Director of the Service de Santé to go over to Belgium when things are a little more settled, to decide with him what institution shall be the recipient of this final gift, and what form the gift shall take. Every supporter of this special appeal may be sure that the money will be used to ameliorate in some way the fate of those brave men to whom we owe so much and who have sacrificed their own health and strength to save the civilisation of the world. ROSE ALLEN.

SPECIAL WANTS.

Pyjamas, shirts and socks.
Clothing for children.

Contributions of money and clothing should be sent to Mrs. Bernard Allen, 14, Gainsborough Gardens, Hampstead, N.W.3.

CORRESPONDENCE.

A PLEA FOR MODERATION.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—In your article on the present hurly-burly, one cause of serious anxiety is omitted: it is the appeal to the worst passions of the public; In the recent speech of the Prime Minister at Newcastle, the note of implacable hatred is unmistakable; and it was responded to by his audience. Now the feelings of our people, just emerged from the most horrible of wars, are already excited and exasperated beyond measure, and it should be the part of a statesman to stand firm for our old tradition of humanity and moderation. As it is, while the election fever is on, any one who should say a word of compassion for the German nation (now helpless at our feet, and suffering extreme misery) is branded as unpatriotic. This is of no good augury for the world's appeasement or for the League of Nations. A little while hence, we shall look back and see what mischief has been done in these days, and that our noblest cause and most glorious deliverance have been profaned.—Yours, &c., K. LEMANN.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION.

APPEAL FOR SUPPORT.

SIR,—On behalf of the Committee I write to thank most sincerely all those who up to the present have so generously contributed towards our "Endowment Fund," and whose names have appeared in your columns. A Capital sum of at least £5,000 is required to extend the work of religious education in our Sunday schools and Homes on the scale contemplated by the Association, and towards this nearly £3,900 has been received. I need hardly say what a great encouragement it will be to the Committee if a further £1,100 is forthcoming in the near future. Those who do not see their way to make a contribution to Capital, but yet are in sympathy with our aims, may render most practical assistance by becoming annual subscribers.—Yours, &c.,

HAROLD WADE,
Hon. Treasurer.

Essex Hall, Essex Street, London, W.C.2.

WE regret to announce that the Rev. Joseph Wood is suffering from a severe attack of bronchitis and will be unable to attend to correspondence for some little time.

PAUL SABATIER WRITES.

THE celebrated French author and theologian, known everywhere as the biographer of St. Francis and to many in England as Jowett lecturer, has written from his country home, under date Nov. 27, a touching reply to Dr. Carpenter's greeting on the signing of the Armistice. We are privileged to copy the following paragraphs:—

"Combien je voudrais qu'à cet instant vous eussiez été dans nos montagnes Huguenotes. Elles ont été aussi splendides ce jour-là, à l'ouïe des cloches de la délivrance, que le 1 août, 1914, lorsque retentit le tocsin de la déclaration de guerre.

"Le premier sentiment a été une immense joie spirituelle à la pensée que l'idéal pour lequel on avait combattu sortait vainqueur de la lutte. Joie religieuse de la foi raffermie, 'L'Éternel règne!'

"Ce n'est qu'après qu'on a pensé que tous ceux pour lesquels on tremblait quelques instants avant, seraient épargnés, qu'on les embrassait sans avoir peur que ce baiser soit le dernier. Puis presque aussitôt les cœurs se sont tournés avec une indicible reconnaissance vers tous ceux qui ont combattu le même combat. Il me serait difficile de vous dire ma joie en constatant tout cela chez d'humbles paysans en les entendant me l'exprimer avec une simplicité et une intimité, une efficacité impossible à décrire.

"Nos deux peuples sont désormais unis par des liens mystiques tels que l'histoire n'en a jamais vus. Il importe de saisir la valeur intellectuelle, morale, et religieuse de cette communion dans le sacrifice pour en tirer tous les fruits bénis qu'elle peut préparer.

"Les églises, toutes les églises, vont-elles comprendre les immenses devoirs qui s'imposent à elles? Ce qui a survécu c'est notre foi, mais non pas celle de notre secte ou de notre parti, mais celle d'une âme plus universelle qu'on ne l'a jamais imaginée, c'est une foi qui a agi également dans toutes et hors de toutes les dénominations. C'est la Jérusalem nouvelle qui descend des cieux, ou plutôt qui s'est édifiée grâce au sacrifice de tous nos martyrs.

"L'ardeur avec laquelle les paroles du Président Wilson ont été accueillies partout, se sont imposées aux consciences avec une autorité qui n'eurent jamais les encycliques des pontifes Romains les plus puissants, au temps où la foi passait pour absolue, cela est un fait historique d'une importance incalculable."

THE Royal Society for the Protection of Birds has again issued an attractive Christmas card, with a picture painted by Mr. Archibald Thorburn. This is the third time that Mr. Thorburn has helped the Society in this way, and his happy skylark singing over "No Man's Land" will bring a message of springtime and hope to many homes. Appropriate verses have been written by A. Trevor-Battye. The cards, which can be had with or without calendar, are to be obtained from the Society's offices, 23 Queen Anne's Gate, London, S.W., price 4s. a dozen, post free.

ALL social workers will have heard with regret of the death from pneumonia of Mr. J. St. George Heath, who was Warden of Toynbee Hall from March, 1914, until October of last year. His high ideals and his devotion to the cause of humanity often found expression in articles of practical as well as religious interest, and he was at one time brought into close touch with Mr. Lloyd George as Secretary of the Land Inquiry Committee. Of late he had been working on Labour questions for the Government, and had much to do with negotiations in connection with the formation of the Whitley Councils.

THE HOME MISSIONARY COLLEGE, MANCHESTER.

THE annual meeting of friends and subscribers was held at the Memorial Hall, Manchester, on Wednesday, November 20, the President, the Rev. A. Gordon, in the chair. Apologies for non-ability to attend had been received from Mr. F. W. Monks, J.P., and the Revs. Dendy Agate, A. W. Fox, and E. Morgan. The annual report was presented by the Rev. G. A. Payne, hon. secretary, and the treasurer's statement of accounts by Mr. J. Hall-Brooks.

In moving the adoption of the report and accounts the Chairman said that it would be felt that the committee had done admirably to make use of the College during the suspension of the ordinary classes owing to the war. Lectures and classes at Summerville had been attended by seventy-five ministers, lay-workers, and lecturers, including ten ministers of other denominations, and the Warden had given several series of lectures, much appreciated, to Sunday school teachers in the district and beyond it. The committee had received an oil painting of the late Mr. J. R. Beard. Among the losses by death was that of Mr. Edward Charlton Harding, at the age of 95, the last of the original subscribers; Mr. George S. Woolley, Mr. James Spedding, Captain Rev. Walter Short, B.A. (killed in action), and other valued friends.

The adoption of the Report was seconded by the Rev. W. G. Cadman, and the appointment of the officers was moved by Mr. H. J. Broadbent. Mr. J. C. Warren, of Nottingham, who is President also of the Unitarian Historical Society, is the new President. Mr. George Hadfield, who has rendered valuable services as Treasurer has retired from the committee. Resolutions of thanks to the Examiners, Medical Officers, and others were passed, also to the Rev. A. Gordon for his three years' services as President.

Summerville has been let for the year as a Women's Hostel, classes meanwhile being carried on for a small number of students at the Memorial Hall.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Bridgwater.—Special Services were held on Sunday, November 24, at Christ Church, to commemorate the 230th Anniversary of the church building. The minister, the Rev. C. E. Pike, preached in the morning on 'Consider the Years,' and in the evening on 'Coleridge in Bridgwater,' recalling the fact that, in June, 1797, Coleridge preached in the building on 'The Necessity of Religious Zeal in These Times.' On the following Thursday, November 28, Mr. Pike and Miss Pike entertained members of the congregation, the choir, and the Sunday school teachers to tea in the schoolroom in commemoration of the 230th anniversary and also of the 10th anniversary of the present ministry. After tea Miss Burridge, the organist, gave an organ recital, and the choir sang some selections in the church. The meeting followed in the schoolroom, when letters regretting inability to attend were read from Mr. Alderman Manchip and Mrs. Broadrick, also a cheery greeting to minister and congregation from the Rev. A. N. Blatchford, which was much appreciated. The Rev. Rudolf Davis was present, and spoke both as a former minister of the church and as District Minister. A paper briefly narrating the coming and going of his predecessors in the ministry of Christ Church since the present church was built in 1688 was read by the Minister. Mr. Clifford Symons, Miss Margaret Spiller, and Mr. Russell spoke on behalf of the congregation. There was a good attendance.

Brixton.—A Sale of Work in connection with Effra Road Church will be opened to-day, December 7, by Mrs. F. J. Nettlefold.—The death is regretted of Mr. Keyte, another victim to the prevailing epidemic.

Bolton: Bank Street.—A Social and Dramatic evening was arranged by the Sunday school for last Saturday evening to raise funds for the Florence Nightingale Convalescent Home for Men. A most interesting and enjoyable programme was carried out, including some excellent dramatic pieces, and the ladies also arranged and took charge of a "treasure stall." There was a very large attendance and a sum of about £40 was realised.

Croydon: Dennett Hall.—Last Sunday evening, in response to the invitation of the minister-in-charge, the service was conducted by Pte. F. Marston, who delivered a fine address on 'Jesus and the Working Classes.' Our young friend, who belongs to a good Wesleyan family in Croydon, has been regularly attending the services at Dennett Hall for some time; and that he has caught the missionary spirit of the larger faith was made evident in the manner in which he led the devotions, and especially in his address, which occasionally rose to a high pitch of eloquence and spiritual fervour, although this was his first experience as a public speaker. At the close, the Rev. Delta Evans spoke a few words of thanks and encouragement to the young preacher, as also did the Rev. J. H. Smith, of Finchley, who was a welcome visitor at the service.

Dundee.—The 48th anniversary of the opening of the Unitarian Christian Church, Dundee, was celebrated on Sunday, November 24, the services being conducted by the Rev. Henry Williamson. On the following Wednesday a social meeting of the congregation was held, reference being made during the evening to the gratitude felt by the present members of the congregation to those who had been responsible for the erection of the Church, and to the appreciation felt for the services of Mr. Williamson, whose continued vitality it was a pleasure to witness. The following resolution was unanimously adopted: "The members assembled desire to record their grateful acknowledgement of the debt owed to the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, the late Messrs. Ivie Mackie, Henry Currer Briggs, Samuel Sharpe and many others, who generously secured for the inhabitants of Dundee the great privilege of Divine Worship and Christian Communion relieved of ecclesiastical bondage and superstition."

Fallsouth.—The Minister of Dob Lane Chapel, the Rev. J. Morley Mills, is preaching a special series of Advent sermons, which began on December 1, dealing with 'The Coming New Attitude to Life,' 'The Coming New Citizen,' 'The Coming New Bond of Nations,' 'The Coming of the Christ that is to be,' and 'The Coming New Religion.' As he rightly points out, "the conclusion of the Great War marks a truly Advent period of momentous import, such as affects every one most deeply," and the subjects announced will be dealt with in "no narrow sectarian manner." The Calendar states that 226 names have been placed on the Roll of Honour.—The death is reported abroad of Sergeant J. P. Taylor-Robinson, Royal Engineers, who died of pneumonia on October 22. He was the grandson of a former Minister of Dob Lane, and his mother, though living on the other side of Manchester, still retains her membership of the Dob Lane congregation.

Halifax.—Mrs. Schroeder gave an interesting account of the life and writings of A.E. (Mr. George W. Russell) to the members of the Mutual Improvement Society in connection with the Northgate End Chapel on November 18. She claims Celtic kinship with A.E. and was thus able to deal in a specially sympathetic way with the ideas of this poet and thinker, whose name is honoured far beyond the country of his birth.—At the morning service on November 10, Mayoral Sunday, the infant daughter of the Mayor and Mayoress, Mr. and Mrs. Howard Clay, was baptised by the Minister, in the presence of a good assembly of aldermen, councillors, magistrates, soldiery, and persons of prominence in civic affairs. The child was named Harriet Fisher after her aunt, Lady Fisher-Smith.—Mr. and Mrs. A. W. Fielding have suffered a sad loss in the death of their only child Eric, aged 15, of pneumonia.

Hull.—In connection with the Park Street Church Literary and Social Union two admirable performances of 'The Trojan Women' of Euripides, in Prof. Gilbert Murray's beautiful translation, were given in Hull on November 21 and 22. The success of this ambitious undertaking is a tribute to the ability and enthusiasm of the members of the Union. The acting was under the direction of one of the leading members of Park Street Church, Mrs. James Downs, assisted by her friends.—The Minister, the Rev. T. M. Falconer, preached at the Thanksgiving Service on Sunday evening, November 17, to a large congregation, having come from Oxford in order to be with his congregation on this historic occasion.

London: Essex Church.—The signing of the armistice on November 11 was celebrated as thankfully at Essex Church as everywhere else. The congregational "At Home" on November 16 was a largely attended gathering. On Sunday a Service for the Scholars was held in the schoolroom, and Mr. Edgar Worthington gave the address.

London: Islington.—Col. Bullock is obliged to be absent on two Sundays in this month, but he will conduct the Christmas Day and Watch Night Services.—On November 9, an afternoon meeting in connection with the Women's League was held in the schoolroom, when an interesting lecture on 'New Duties of Citizenship' was given by Miss Hill, a member of the Women's Local Government Society. The programme for the session includes 'A Talk on Italy' (December 14), by Miss Pesci (with lantern views), and an address on 'The Work of the Women Patrols,' by Mrs. Classon Drummond.—The 4th North London Troop, B.S., gave their first Annual Concert in the schoolroom on Thursday, November 7, as a result of which the Troop Funds benefited to the extent of £16. The Scoutmaster (W. T. Puddifoot) gave a resumé of the Troop's history, and badges were presented by Col. Bullock, who delivered a short address. A presentation was also made to Mr. Puddifoot on behalf of the Troop. On the following Saturday the concert was repeated before a party of wounded soldiers, for whom an "unrationed" tea had been provided.—Ernest Seabrook Terry, 1st Battalion, Wiltshire Regt. (late of 21st Middlesex Regt.—"Islington's Own"), was killed in action on October 23, aged 26. He is described as "a brave soldier, fighting in the very front of the attack." The death is also recorded of Miss M. J. Pate, at the age of 40, which leaves a great void in the life of the church. In the many years of her association with the congregation she had become a personal friend to most of the members, and her family's sorrow in their loss is widely shared. She rendered much willing help as Secretary of the Observation Society, as a valued member of the old Reading Circle, and in placing her knowledge of music at the service of the various institutions; but, above all, her friends are grateful for the good influence of her mind and character.

Mansfield.—The death is recorded with great regret in the Old Meeting House Calendar of Mr. William Hollins, J.P., of Berry Hill, on November 5, from pneumonia following influenza. The funeral was at Pleasley Church on November 8, when the Rev. T. P. Spedding and Messrs. J. Birks, J. E. Mitchell, and C. J. Vallance attended as representing the Old Meeting House. After morning service on November 17 a resolution expressing sympathy with Mrs. Hollins and family and a sense of the services rendered by Mr. Hollins to the congregation was passed. The Chapel-warden, in proposing the resolution, said that there was no name connected with the Old Meeting which was held in greater honour and reverence than that of the Hollins family. Their place of worship bore many evidences of their generosity through many generations, and the parsonage and the parsonage fund showed how indebted they had been to these benefactors. Any institution which was worthy of support had always received the consideration of Mr. Hollins, and the town as a whole would be the poorer for his death.

Northampton.—At the Annual Meeting of the Northampton Temperance and Band of Hope Union, of which for many years Miss Sale has been Hon. Secretary, the Rev. W. Hall, minister of Kettering Road Church, was cordially welcomed as the new President. The Union comprises twenty-nine societies in the town and district.—Mrs. W. H. Robinson, whose death occurred recently, had not been able, through failing health, to attend the services, but her association, and that of her husband, with Kettering Road Church is affectionately remembered by the older members. It is now stated that C. H. Miles, who has been reported missing since August 9, was killed in battle on or about August 4.

Ottawa.—The Rev. (Lieut.-Col.) S. C. Bullock having realised that his military duties would entail absence for an indefinite time, tendered his resignation of the pulpit here, and it was received with much regret. The congregation passed the following resolution: "The congregation desires to place on record their appreciation of the fact that Mr. Bullock, although an American citizen, volunteered for the Canadian service, and during the whole term of the war has remained at the post of duty, and has rendered valuable services as an officer in the active forces. We also thank Mr. Bullock for his expressions of goodwill to the congregation and its members, and heartily reciprocate the same." The Rev. Henry J. Adlard has been appointed minister.

Pendleton.—The Unitarian Church Calendar records the death of 2nd Lieut. Archie Milner, who was killed in action on November 4.

Pudsey.—On Wednesday week, the annual Sale of Work was opened at the Unitarian Church Schoolroom, Mr. Joseph A. Webster being chairman. Apologies were received from Mr. and Mrs. Geo. Verity, and the Rev. J. Burkitt. Mr. Sydney Webster opened the bazaar. Mr. E. Binks proposed a vote of thanks to the chairman and opener, as well as to the ladies. The Revs. W. T. Garling, and R. Newell, minister, also spoke. Donations were received from several friends, and from Gunner Walter Noble (in France) a ten franc note. On the Saturday the children of the Sunday school opened the sale, represented by Miss Beatrice Charlton, who handed in their gift of £2 6s. 6d.. Master Philip Tindall presided. Little speeches, songs and recitations were given by other children representing each class in the school.

Scottish Churches.—While in Scotland the Rev. V. D. Davis of Bournemouth visited the Unitarian Church, Aberdeen, and gave an address on October 23 on 'The Challenge of the War to the Churches'; at Dundee he preached morning and evening on October 27; and at Edinburgh on November 3. He also gave a lecture at Kirkcaldy on October 28 on 'A Gospel for To-day,' and at Stenhousemuir on October 31.—The Scottish Unitarian gives an encouraging account of the Open Platform Club Meetings at Aberdeen, which are well attended, and describes the Musical and Dramatic Entertainment recently given by the Women's League, which included a dialogue and 'The V.C.' by Lady Margaret Sackville, who was present, and who recited one of her poems.—At Stenhousemuir the members of the Unitarian Church gave a delightful entertainment in November to fifty wounded men from the Naval Hospital in the neighbourhood.—Mr. Alexander MacLaren is contributing a series of 'Impressions of Army Life' to The Scottish Unitarian. The following passage from the first of these, dealing with life in a Training Camp, will be of interest to some of our readers: "From remarks in some of the Unitarian papers the impression is given that one must in the army give as your religious denomination one of the three great religions—Presbyterian, Church of England, or Roman Catholic—or in some few cases, Wesleyan. In my own case, at my first camp I found that the nearest Unitarian church was at Darlington, some twenty-four miles away, consequently I attended the Presbyterian service. As in good weather it was held in the open-air in a pleasant little valley near the camp, I enjoyed the services very much, but when we moved to Edinburgh I insisted in attending the services of my own denomination. Strangely enough every difficulty was placed in my way, the argument being that once you are in the roll of Presbyterians it is as the laws of the Medes and Persians, it cannot be altered. But I knew I had right on my side, and insisted on the change, and, as a result, during my stay of three months in Auld Reekie, I attended regularly the services at St. Mark's Chapel, and made even closer and warmer the many friendships I had with my old friends worshipping there." Mr. MacLaren gives a graphic description of his experiences in the firing line, ending with the terrific attack by the enemy at Mont Kemmel, when he himself was wounded, and after which only 15 men of his company out of 200 answered the roll.

Stannington.—The Sheffield Unitarian Monthly Record reports the death in India from pneumonia of Driver Harry Revitt, R.F.A., son of Mr. and Mrs. George Revitt of Stannington. This is the second son of this family lost through the war, making a total of 11 deaths, 3 missing, 1 a prisoner, and 2 seriously wounded, out of the small circle of young men connected with Underbank Chapel.—On October 31, Lottie, the second daughter of Mr. and Mrs. J. W. Dyson, also succumbed to pneumonia at the age of 18, and on November 17, when the congregation joined in thanksgiving for the termination of hostilities, reference was made to her services as a member of the choir for eight years and to the cheerfulness with which she gave her help in this and other ways.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

Our readers are reminded that we go to Press on Tuesday in Christmas week. All letters and items of news, therefore, intended for publication in our issue of Dec. 28 should reach the Editor at 13, Bream's Buildings, Fetter Lane, E.C.4., not later than Monday morning, Dec. 23.

THE Prime Minister, speaking to the women at Queen's Hall on Monday, once more ventured—shall we say—to warn the hotter headed and greedier patriots who have become so noisy since the armistice began, that we must avoid an "Alsace-Lorraine" method in drawing up terms of peace. In other words, we really have to ask ourselves as a nation whether it will be profitable, in the long run, to drive such a bargain as shall lead to an inextinguishable passion for revenge, and so repeat the fatal mistake of Germany in 1871. Ebenezer Elliott's cry rings to us over two generations: "Shall crime bring crime for ever?" Granted, as indeed it must be, that the German nation by its approval of the action of its rulers in the war has deserved drastic treatment, the question before Mr. Lloyd George and the other peace framers is how to blend a wholesome severity with prudent consideration for the future interests of mankind, including ourselves, and not excluding the Germans. Higher aspects of the case there are, of which some of our statesmen are well aware; but even those who care little for religious aims may come to see that a bad peace means bad business.

It is impossible to read the summary (given in Wednesday's Times) of Prof. Hans Delbrück's article in the Preussische Jahrbücher without deep interest. The veteran historian—his seventieth birthday coincided with armistice day—quotes Grote's saying in his later years when disappointed by democracy, "I have outlived my faith"; though Delbrück's faith was in Kaiserism, on behalf of which his pen was active during the war as before. He confesses to being entirely wrong about the prospects of the war up to the last; even when defeat was obvious he still believed that by political moderation a catastrophe, such as has happened, could be averted. "I greatly underestimated," he says, "the internal dissolution of our strength and the shattering of our once so firm political structure." The event is worse than his worst fears.

DELBRÜCK tells us how the censorship would not allow him to reveal to his countrymen the facts, e.g., concerning the number of American troops transported to France up to June last; but we know something of these censor tactics in our own country. "Was it really necessary," he asks, "to keep such facts from the German people in order to maintain its spirit?" We have asked a similar question here, more than once. The admission is made that Prince Max's conversion was but a manoeuvre—a "thin hope"; the enemy, however, was not deceived by the professed "change of heart." He also confesses that the Socialists have a right to power because they were the only people who were right about the war. His observations as a student of history, while specially bearing of course on the future of Germany, have significance for all civilised nations, our own included. "What if we also," like the Roman Empire when its "highly educated aristocracy" was succeeded by a "new aristocracy in bearskins," are "approaching times in which power will pass into the hands not of the illiterate but, still worse, of the half-educated? . . . Has the League of Nations a future, and is the conception of Great Power dying?" So wistfully writes the German scholar in his disillusionment and dejection; but have we, the victors, no grounds for wistfulness too?

IF all the women who have votes record them to-day their influence will be proportionately greater than it is ever likely to be again, owing to the regrettable loss of soldiers' votes which is sure to be very serious indeed. The general expectation, which our own observation certainly tends to confirm, is that instead of using this unique opportunity to the full a large number of women will, for one reason or other, abstain from voting. Perhaps in the interests of due balance of the sexes at the poll this will not be considered unfortunate; but we sincerely hope that a really important polling strength will be exhibited at the election. To vote wrong may be pardoned as human; not to vote at all is, if not downright stupid, a misfortune to the individual and the democracy. As to the trouble about the soldiers' vote it amounts to a scandal, and will certainly have troublous consequences by and by.

THE immense enthusiasm evinced at the meeting of Free Church men and women to support Labour on Wednesday at Kingsway Hall was very significant, and showed how strongly the tide of Nonconformity is flowing against all attempts to curb the spirit of freedom and independence. Dr. Clifford, who presided, received as might have been expected a tremendous ovation, and a very warm reception was also given to Dr. Orchard. The chairman, whose fighting courage and mental vigour appear in no wise to have diminished, although the weight of years has grown heavier, explained that those who were responsible for the meeting were not all agreed in every particular with the aims of the Labour Party; indeed, when he thought of some of the things he himself would have liked to see in its programme, he must confess that it did not quite express himself; but they were there to show their admiration for it, and to rejoice that the bases upon which it rested were justice, righteousness, freedom and higher internationalism. Above all, he said, the Labour programme was a New Testament programme, a point which was welcomed and emphasised by subsequent speakers.

AN old Eton story tells of a newcomer to the school who, being asked his name, said: "I am Viscount Weymouth, and I shall be Marquis of Bath," and was promptly kicked, once for the Viscount and again for the Marquis. This tale comes to mind as we read what happened when the body of the late Emperor Francis Joseph was taken for interment to the chapel of the Capuchins in Vienna. The officer in command having duly knocked with mailed hand at the barred gate for admission the monk within, in accordance with ancient custom, asked who was there. "Franciscus Josephus primus," was the answer, "Austriæ Imperator, Rex Hungariæ, Bohemiæ, Illyriæ, Lodomeriæ," &c. "I know him not," said the monk, "speak again." After a pause and now with submissive tones the reply came: "Franciscus Josephus, a poor erring wanderer, seeks rest." Then only was the gate opened for him who but a day or two ago had worn the dual crown. If the Church of Christ had only been as direct in the presence of living monarchs as by ancient rite it is in that of the dead, Christendom would have been a far different thing from what it is.

THERE used to be advertised a certain whisky of which the possible purchaser was told, not as a warning presumably, that once tasted it could never be done without. We should like to recommend for psychological experiment, if for no other reason, that any reader with half-a-crown loose in his pocket should buy a copy of Rueille at once, and see what happens. The second issue (November) is just out, with 180 pages of fascinating fiction and still more fascinating fact. The editor is John Galsworthy, and the contributors include Thomas Hardy, John Masefield, Sir Owen Seaman, W. H. Hudson, G. K. Chesterton, John Drinkwater, and many other clever writers, and pictures are given by Max Beerbohm, Frank Brangwyn, and others. The magazine is 'Devoted to the Disabled Sailor and Soldier,' and special articles tell the wonderful story of what is being done towards curing and training these men for civilian employment, and make appeal to our gratitude and our self-respect lest any of them should sink into hopeless poverty in return for their services in the war. Buy it at once, we say, and see if you are not compelled to do more.

THE letter addressed by the officials of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association to the District Societies which we print this week demands prompt and practical attention. The words of Dr. S. A. Eliot, President of the American Unitarian Association, are precisely applicable to the position on this side. "For these churches of ours," he says, "it is now or never. If once this period of testing and the resulting reconstruction passes, and the new world that is in process of making is established in indifference or hostility to the principles in which we believe, our day has passed, and we shall witness the rapid decay and dissolution of the churches of our love and hope. I am persuaded of better things. The day of our judgment need not be the day of our doom. But our salvation must be of our own working." Can we not be true to our professions and add: "For it is God that worketh in us" for the advancement of truth, brotherhood, and all nobleness of human life on earth?

REMEDY.

UNTO the hills, by happy fortune, we lifted our eyes once more, and help came as of old. The noble curves of their nearer ranges stood out clear in the December sunshine, the more distant summits looked down over drifts of mist. December colours, delightful to the observant eye, tinted the valleys and breastworks—the warm browns of withered beech and oak, the gleam of silvery birch, the ordered pyramids of fir, the lonely pine. Wide upland pastures kept soft and verdurous by copious rains spread out their refreshing green, broken here and there by darker tufts of gorse mingled with bracken. Farther away, textures and colours became less definite; was that ruddy gleam an outcrop of rock, or an autumn flush of whortle-berry, sorrel, moss? Fresh and cool, but not unkindly, came the breeze; replenished streams slipped and foamed from ledge to ledge. Immediately in front were rich wheat-lands newly ploughed. It was good to be there, to find refuge in what had been in happier days a playground, and was now a sanctuary.

We had turned thither from the strife of tongues, to reach, were it possible, an underlying peace of things, too deep and full for mortal strivings to mar it, where they should fall into place like twitterings of violin strings superposed on the untroubled bass of a world-music. This strife of tongues was, indeed, discordant in itself, and all so pitiful. Within a month, a little month, since there had happened that which set the heart leaping as it had not done for four long years, an event that drew forth at once laughter and tears, songs and lowliest prayer, it had come to this! Men and women who in a great cause had united their utmost strength and wisdom were now, so soon, wrangling and boasting, and finessing, and jeering, if by any means they might snatch the spoils of office. The newspapers, of late rendered bright by records of deathless deeds, now enlarged their borders so as to give the public full exhibition of the folly and pettiness of rival partisans. Sweet reasonableness, manly candour, fair play, and good manners generally—where had they gone? Were we, as a people, become so morally and mentally debilitated in the course of war's long fever that we must needs fall into this temper, irritable and irritating? Palpable injustices, too, were these the fit reward of the soldier and sailor, who had fought for the triumph of democracy abroad only to find it denied at home? Then came in ominous demands on the part of large bodies of workpeople, and no less ominous concessions. And all the while vast domestic problems consequent on the cessation of munition work and the coming home of prisoners, the disabled, the discharged, pressed upon our mind in common with that of thoughtful persons everywhere; and beyond these national borders lay the tangled skein of international life challenging, if not defying, the utmost human wisdom and patience to unravel it.

Who has not in these days considered these things and been troubled? Which of us is not conscious of the need of remedy for a certain sickness of heart; of a reassurance, a healing touch to calm the pulse and establish the will anew? Unto the hills, seeking remedy almost without knowing what we did, we were thus lifting our weary eyes. Not in vain. The beauty of earth—strange, often marred, always renewing—the soothing, delicious, purifying spirit of Nature is still ever about us. We have been too forgetful of it, to our serious, nay, our immeasurable loss. If wisdom lies in knowing the proportion of things how unwise is the man who, lost in any absorbing experience of the moment, omits from his sum of Life so great, so rich a factor as this? "Live on a mountain," says the Stoic Emperor to himself. We climbed a favourite headland, and thence, as from an eyrie, looked abroad on the wide lowlands, dotted with villages and farms, with the smoke of far-off towns here and there upon the horizon. How admirable, after all, is the well-ordered society of men! Their powers, externally so slight, internally are infinite. Their achievements are only exceeded by their unfulfilled aspirations. Home, the arts, trade, religion—aye, even politics, so often unlovely—tell of an entrancing secret, were but the human creature harmonised with the Power and Will Creative. "Men exist for the sake of one another," continues Aurelius, "teach them then, or bear with them." As we drink in the vision of the dear land again the short December day hastens to the dusk. Over yonder shoulder the crescent moon shines already; soon red Aldebaran and the Pleiades will come on, leading up Orion with all his brilliances and his glooms. "So hot, my little man!" the stars will say again to us as they did to Emerson. Really, is there not enough Righteous Will in this world, at once so very old and so beautifully young, for us to be comforted? We return to our work and our strenuous endeavours quieted and strengthened; and, thanks to the tonic of the mountains, we shall even vote serenely.

ALDERMAN CHAMBERLAIN, Lord Mayor of Birmingham, has presented the City with a fine picture from the collection of his father, the late Mr. Joseph Chamberlain, in memory of his sister whose death we recently recorded.

INFLUENTIAL petitions have been sent to the Premier on behalf of the liberation of the imprisoned "conscientious objectors," numbering some 1,500. Over 700 of them have been in gaol two years, some nearly three. The petitioners are mostly opposed to these men as to military duty, but they feel that whatever reasons of State existed for holding them in prison have vanished with the signing of the armistice.

NORTHAMPTON has the distinction of having established the first branch of the League of Nations Union, at a meeting held in the Town Hall on October 8 under the presidency of the Mayor, and addressed by the Member of Parliament for the town, Mr. C. A. McCurdy, one of the founders of the Union. A Council representative of all political and religious parties has been elected, with Sir H. Randall as President, and other honorary officers, and from it have been formed Executive, Meetings, and Literature Committees. The Rev. W. C. Hall has been elected Chairman of the Literature Committee.

BOOKS AND REVIEWS.

FOLK-LORE IN THE OLD TESTAMENT.

FOLK-LORE IN THE OLD TESTAMENT: STUDIES IN COMPARATIVE RELIGION, LEGEND AND LAW. By Sir James George Frazer. 3 vols. London: Macmillan & Co. 37s. 6d. net.

It is a refreshing experience to turn for a few moments from the tumultuous interests of the present hour to the calm spaciousness of a mind, hospitable to many and varied interests, like that of Sir James Frazer. Four years of the passions and anxieties of war have given us few books of enduring value, but his study of Folk-Lore in the Old Testament is one of them. It has appeared at an opportune moment to remind us of the good things which we may recover with the coming of peace, leisure for study, the search for truth, and a respect for the infinite curiosity of the human mind. Sir James Frazer's method in these three volumes is the one which is familiar to all students of the Golden Bough. Round the nucleus of primitive narrative or legend he arranges a vast mass of illustrative material gathered from the remotest parts of the earth. In this way it becomes possible to draw certain general conclusions about the diffusion of legendary beliefs and the way in which the mind of primitive man deals with the elements of mystery or supernatural fear which surround his life. That these elements enter largely into the early narratives of the Old Testament, and that many of them are closely connected with the use of magic, few intelligent readers will deny. The days of our ignorance, when a book like this would have been decried for its impiety, belong to the past. We recognise that one of the things most necessary for the understanding of the religion of a former age, and this is true above all when we are dealing with ancient forms of ritual, is a knowledge of the popular mind, its beliefs and fears and its immemorial customs at the turning points of human life.

It is one of the marvellous features of Sir James Frazer's work that the abundance of his materials is never allowed to spoil his literary art. In less capable hands a book like this would simply have been learned and dull. But it is the same hand that gave us "Passages of the Bible chosen for their literary beauty and interest" which has retold many of the Bible stories in these pages with a sure instinct for their colour and romance. In confirmation of this statement let the reader turn to the description of the passage of the Red Sea. Nor is Sir James Frazer a sceptical historian. He is quick to discern "the kernel of fact" which underlies "the husk of fiction," and he illustrates the marvellous features in this narrative of the escaping Israelites by most apposite reference to an incident in the history of Alexander the Great and an exploit of the Romans in the second Carthaginian war. Writing of the vein of mysticism which ran through Scipio's practical nature, and the almost divine honours which were paid to him after his death, he says: "Such a union of soldiership and statesmanship with religious exaltation is eminently fitted to attract the reverence of the multitude; it was one of the secrets of the Elder Scipio's power, and we can hardly doubt that it contributed largely to the belief of the Israelites in the divine legation of Moses."

In conclusion we venture to express the hope that it will not be long before the elements of folk-lore and popular superstition which are embedded in the Gospel narratives will be discussed with a similar combination of reverence and boldness. Sir James Frazer's method of dealing with the miraculous elements, which enter so largely into popular religious movements, is far more fruitful than the explanations of the older rationalism. We cannot dismiss the suggestion as either incorrect or absurd that in such incidents as the withering of the fig-tree, the Gadarene swine or the finding of a coin in the mouth of a fish, we must look chiefly to folk-lore for an explanation, any more than we can do so in the case of similar narratives in mediæval hagiology. But we hasten to add that this recognition of the baser elements in the world's divinest records only gives to them and to their central figure a more ethereal beauty. This is Sir James Frazer's own point of view, and he has expressed it in the following admirable passage of his preface with which this short notice may fitly close. After pointing out that to dwell on the traces of savagery and superstition is not to disparage the spiritual religion and the pure morality of which the Old Testament is an imperishable monument, he writes as follows:—

"On the contrary, the revelation of the baser elements which underlay the civilisation of ancient Israel, as they underlie the civilisation of modern Europe, serves rather as a foil to enhance by contrast the glory of a people which, from such dark depths of ignorance and cruelty, could rise to such bright heights of wisdom and virtue, as sunbeams appear to shine with a greater effulgence of beauty when they break through the murky clouds of a winter evening than when they flood the earth from the sure splendour of a summer noon. The annals of savagery and superstition unhappily compose a large part of human literature; but in what other volume shall we find, side by side with that melancholy record, psalmists who poured forth their sweet and solemn strains of meditative piety in the solitude of the hills or in green pastures and beside still waters; prophets who lit up their beatific visions of a blissful future with the glow of an impassioned imagination; historians who bequeathed to distant ages the scenes of a remote past embalmed for ever in the amber of a pellucid style? These are the true glories of the Old Testament and of Israel; these, we trust and believe, will live to delight and inspire mankind, when the crudities recorded alike in sacred and profane literature shall have been purged away in a nobler humanity of the future." W. H. D.

It is welcome news that the Vineyard, which was suspended during the war, is about to make its appearance once more as a quarterly. The Vineyard will in future stand as the official organ of the Peasant Arts Guild, with which it has always been in close touch, and it will still be under the able editorship of Mrs. Egerton King who has done so much for the re-invigoration of country life and crafts.

READERS of Mrs. J. Collins Odgers' 'The Dweller in the Innermost,' an address delivered to the Women's League which was published in booklet form three years ago, will be glad to know that the League has just brought out in the same way a second address, 'Torchbearers,' delivered at University Hall on September 26 last. It deals with the services rendered to humanity by women who have been faithful to the Inner Vision and who have left their mark on history, and a reproduction of Burne-Jones's beautiful picture 'Hope' on the first page, gives the appropriate key-note. The booklet, which comes just at the right season, can be obtained at Essex Hall, Essex Street, Strand, London, W.C., price 6d. (and postage).

AUTHORITY AND FREEDOM.

THE gravest problem of our civilisation is to ensure the right co-operation and adjustment of the principles of authority and freedom. Handled singly they lead, the one to tyranny and slavery, the other to anarchy and licence: each needs the counterpoise and mutual interaction of the other.

The logic of the militant suffragette forces her to utter lawlessness and to disrespect of everything outside her own immediate line of advance. The general striker imperils the whole of society to gain his particular ends. The Party of Law and Order defies the Constitution if the Constitution does not back its wishes. And Germany flings aside as "scraps of paper," on the plea of military necessity, any international laws which conflict with the momentary interests of the State. In all these cases a more or less reckless individualism asserts itself which does not hesitate to pursue its ends at the expense of law and even at the peril of the community.

The arbitrary imposition of authority from without, whether in the social or in the religious sphere, has had its day, and can never appeal again to thinking people. But the urgency of authority, other and loftier than our own, to which we still should bow, and in following which we should discover our highest freedom, has not as yet been sufficiently apprehended. And the freedom men need to-day is a freedom which St. James has felicitously called the "perfect law of liberty."

Roman Catholicism refers the layman to his priest; orthodox Protestantism sets a Bible in front of him; heterodoxy supplies him with neither priest nor Bible but bids him follow the inward light of his own individual reason and conscience. He is often in parlous case under all these treatments. In Roman Catholicism he is in dire peril of slavery; in Protestantism he may pick and choose from hundreds of conflicting sects and opinions; and in heterodoxy he can "gang his own gait" and be "free of the universe." This last condition is regarded by many as the most precious of human privileges. But the strong probability is that neither Roman Catholic despotism, nor Protestant Bible-liberty, nor heterodox licence really meets his case. The Roman Catholic is so far right that he considers the average man, in and by himself alone, an incompetent judge in moral and religious matters. The Protestant is so far right that he considers he needs at least the guidance afforded by an authoritative book. And the heterodox is wholly wrong in concluding that he needs no guidance at all.

First, then, as to the competence of any average individual to be sole and unguided arbiter in moral and religious concerns. Does he realise adequately the limited range of his own experience and observation of life; or how seriously he is handicapped in arriving at just objective conclusions by the idiosyncrasies, perversities and wilful impulses of his own self-centred nature? For, in order to reach just judgments as regards the deepest problems of life and conduct, there is needed both a profound experience and knowledge of life and an altogether limitless self-control and self-mastery, such as enabled Christ in the Fourth Gospel to say: "I have overcome the world"; or such as the ancient world demanded as a preliminary requisite of all philosophic study, entered upon only after the strictest course of ascetic self-discipline. Is it as the result of all this that Dick, Tom and Harry take upon themselves to-day to pronounce judgment on the subtlest and most vital questions of morals and religion?

In all other departments of knowledge a certain competence is required before any importance is attached to judgments reached. Of the scholar we demand years of concentrated study upon his own special subject, and a close familiarity with all that has been thought and written upon it. But in moral and religious matters, the most important of all, anyone may receive "a call" and get a hearing provided only he have sufficient confidence in himself, though we often fail to inquire upon what solid ground, or flimsy, that self-confidence is based.

We have further to bear in mind how peculiarly intricate and complicated to-day many religious, moral and social questions are; how all-absorbing are the strain and stress of the merely economic side of an average man's life; how calculated usually to unfit him for the particular competence required; and how often now-a-days, owing to the widening range of knowledge, the expert is demanded in every sphere.

Dr. Fr. W. Foerster, in his great book on 'Autorität und Freiheit,' not yet translated, to which I owe a very large indebtedness, has the following suggestive passages:—

"It is interesting to note how careful and conscientious people now are, in scientific and technical matters, to eliminate all possible disturbing influences in their investigations and statements—whereas in the most supremely difficult and responsible sphere, in questions of the philosophy and conduct of life, they are quite content to think and judge without testing their methods and without paying the slightest heed to disturbing factors and sources of error. How many serious and difficult researches have been undertaken, e.g., to discover a material composition for the normal standard of the metre which should protect it from temperature variations! Yet the very people who clearly understand that the normal metre-measure must be made of specially rigid metal, and that it must be most carefully preserved from variations of pressure and temperature, would protest vigorously if it were maintained that a certain protection through the dignity of great traditions and institutions is indispensable to the standards of the moral life!"

"When fixing a compass to a warship, care has to be taken to isolate the needle from all magnetic currents which might arise from the metal hull of the ship. But no one asks whether the compass in man—the individual reason and conscience which is to show us our way in life—is not deflected a thousand times by the disturbing influences arising from our physical nature, and whether it is not necessary constantly to correct the individual compass by fixing the gaze on the one Personality who alone stands above all conflicting forces."

"Nowadays everyone has his own private watch and directs himself according to its readings; but what would happen if he never regulated it by the certified normal time of the observatories, and set its hands by all sorts of personal speculations, impressions and requirements?"

Plato demanded for his ideal State a class of spiritual leaders who, undistracted by the clamouring interests of the moment, would be dedicated to the discovery of the highest truths, so that by means of these truths the whole of human activity might be enlightened and directed. Carlyle endeavoured vainly to convert our democracy to the worship of heroes. Christian statesmen would convert us, and subject us, to the supreme over-lordship of Christ. It is clear that the time is rapidly approaching when Plato and Carlyle and Christian statesmen are likely once again to obtain a hearing, if the world is not to be delivered up to the vagaries and one-sidednesses and short-sightednesses and lawlessnesses of self-opinionated individuals whose Polestar is too often a sky-rocket.

There is an even deeper reason why we cannot at all securely rely upon the judgments of the average individual in moral, social and religious concerns. Not only is he lacking in that wide and deep experience and knowledge of human life which are the essentials of just judgments; and in that complete self-mastery which is equally essential if his judgments are not to be deflected by his own peculiar self-interests, illusions and passions; but he is also frequently incapable of that utter renunciation of self which truth demands. Self-preservation is as a rule dearer to him than self-sacrifice. The average individual is not prepared for the sacrifices truth demands of him; he is too enamoured of an easy life, too fearless lest its normal flow should be disturbed; he cozens himself into the belief that the revealer is a disturber of the peace, and an enemy of life (as he knows it), and clears him out of the way as speedily as possible with the Cross or the hemlock leaf. Not in this spirit is truth discovered or revealed. It is revealed only to that deepest intuition which is the fine bloom of the profoundest life-experience and knowledge, of the utmost self-mastery, and of unlimited self-devotion.

The lack of the modern man is a lack of reverence and humility. He will never truly learn until he is able to recognise and prostrate himself before Someone far higher than himself, until he can perceive that there are truths far beyond his range, which his own narrow experience is incapable of testing. His first thought should be not to criticise Christ or the Ancients, but to tell himself in all humility how paltry is his own life experience and knowledge, his own degree of self-mastery, his own self-renunciation, his own measure of insight and intuition when compared with that of these which has withstood the test of the ages.

Is it not highly probable that the fullest development of individual personality would lie in quite another direction than that of a foolish self-sufficiency? Would not the lowly following of Christ prove to be our highest freedom? H. H. JOHNSON.

THE LITTLE CHURCH OF SOMMESOUS.

IN 1914 during the first battle of the Marne the little church of Sommesous, which had held its own against wind and weather for some eight or nine hundred years, fell a victim to the German guns. The romanesque pillars and arches of the nave were solid enough to withstand the bombardment, but the roof fell in, the walls were battered, and most of the windows—alas, for the beautiful stained glass!—ceased to exist except as gaping holes.

When the enemy was driven back and the villagers returned, Mass was celebrated in one of the farm-houses. By the autumn of 1918, the walls of the church had been restored, and a wooden roof kept out the rain, except where it drove in through the unglazed windows. Before the war, the church was classified as an historic monument, and has, therefore, been restored by the State. The work was begun last April (1918), and by the autumn the church could be used again for worship.

On Michaelmas Day (St. Michael is the patron saint of France), which fell this year on a Sunday, the altar was decorated with flowers—Michaelmas daisies, dahlias, and little sunflowers; a few camp-stools and chairs were brought in for the mothers and grandmothers of the village, a choir of little girls and boys stood in a group in one of the transepts, and the rest of the church was full of soldiers standing. In his short address the priest spoke as a soldier to his comrades. Victory was already within sight and he bade them remember to be merciful in the great hour that was near at hand. As he finished the children's voices, unaccompanied, for there was no organ, broke out joyfully in the hymn to St. Michael; boys and girls sang alternate verses and the soldiers joined in the chorus exulting in victory.

Once more the church is decorated; it is November 17, the armistice is signed, but there are no flowers to-day, for the frost has withered them, like death breathing over the battlefields. Flags and evergreens, however, announce the day of victory. One transept is full of village people, in the other is the choir, reinforced by soldiers from the camp who have been practising with one of the French ladies at the Foyer du Soldat. In the middle of the nave is a group of French and American officers, and the American Director of the Foyer du Soldat; behind them the band from the American camp, and a dense mass of soldiers in blue surrounds the group of khaki, filling the whole building and overflowing into the churchyard.

The preacher to-day, though mobilisé, is altogether priestly, with nothing military in his demeanour—a man from the south, dark and ascetic-looking, a scholar rather than a parish priest. In his gold embroidered chasuble he represented the ancient splendour and dignity of the Church. Very quietly he began his sermon, but every word could be heard. He preached from the text "Nous devons renaître à nouveau." Thankfulness was the keynote of his sermon. A glowing tribute was paid to our soldiers, to those who had given their lives, and to those who survived. In conclusion he emphasised the duty that lies before us all to re-make our lives and our countries, and he repeated the text "we must be born again." After the sermon the choir of children and soldiers sang the Te Deum, in which the whole congregation joined. Then the American band played a hymn, so softly that the music seemed to come from far away, echoing the low notes of the great drum. An anthem followed, sung by a soldier, the 'Pater' of Dubois; afterwards 'Le ciel a visité la terre,' by Gounod, and 'l'Hymne aux Morts' of Bourgault Dinondray was rendered by the lady from the Foyer du Soldat (Y.M.C.A.), a Protestant, with a sweet and rich voice, supported by her choir of soldiers. After the singing the American band played with their accustomed vigour the French military marches, 'Marche Lorraine,' 'Sambre et Meuse,' &c., and nearly blew off the wooden roof. More singing, and then the 'Marseillaise.' Tears were running down weather-beaten cheeks, and as we filed out of church our hearts were too full for words.

Duty called me to hasten away; the strains of Chopin's funeral march played by the band in the churchyard followed me across the frozen fields, and further west they travelled on the thoughts of the Americans to the homes of their fallen comrades across the Atlantic.

IN a 'Service of Joyful Remembrance' compiled by Dr. Crothers for the Armistice thanksgiving, among mention of the various nations whose allied efforts won victory occurs the words: "Especially do we remember the people of Canada, our neighbours separated by a boundary line which for a hundred years has been kept inviolate, not by forts and armies, but by the irresistible power of goodwill."

THE late Jenkin Lloyd Jones, says the Rev. J. Haynes Holmes, detested what he called the "excess baggage" of the churches, and in this sense accepted as a genuine tribute the remark of a Catholic priest, made in answer to the inquiry of an anxious mother whether her boy might go to Mr. Jones's institute—"Let him go; Jenkin Lloyd Jones hasn't got religion enough to hurt anybody!"

OUR TASK IN THE FUTURE.

THE following letter has been addressed to the Secretaries of our various District Societies and Unions:—

DEAR SIR,—The victory won for freedom, truth and righteousness fills us with unspeakable admiration and gratitude. But we have constantly to remember that freedom, truth and righteousness are not self-operative forces, which work independently of man's desire and will-power. We have witnessed how for this generation they were more than once almost destroyed during the war. The Fatherhood of God, the Brotherhood of Man, Salvation by Character, and other approved statements of Unitarian Faith, are too frequently regarded as if they were self-operative principles. We may be sure that the men and women who will be foremost in religious freedom and progress, and to whom Unitarians might reasonably appeal for sympathy and co-operation, will make far-reaching claims upon those who aspire to become leaders and teachers in the world of religion.

An opportunity has come such as liberal religious people have never had before. Creeds and ceremonial observances, once full of life, are now losing power over large numbers of former adherents. Courageous thinking, sincere feeling, and human sympathy are needed if religion is to gain a firm hold upon the minds and hearts of men, and mould their lives to nobler issues.

Many of our Churches have had to contend with great difficulties during the war, and it is doubtful whether the coming of Peace will immediately remove them. It is, therefore, important that we should carefully consider ways and means of making our Churches more effective instruments for good in the nation. The Committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association are most anxious to assist, not only in restoring the pre-war activities of the Churches, but also in making them a greater power and influence of good. They appeal, in the first instance, to the District Societies to consider carefully the present condition and future prospects of the Churches in their respective areas. Circumstances vary greatly in different parts of the country, and local conditions should be studied with a view to increased strength. Inquiry should reveal many cases where the Church may be made a more powerful centre of influence than it has been in the past. The effectiveness of a Church does not consist in its size, but in its quality—in its consciousness of a message and a mission. Where a particular Church has really ceased to live, it may often be the wisest policy to close it, dispose of the property, and put the proceeds to some better use in a new district.

May we plead that the Committee of your Society set to work without delay to prepare a report surveying your whole area, and then submit any practical schemes for consideration by the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. In this connection we would remind you of the Conference of Representatives of District Societies which met at Essex Hall in 1916, when a report was published containing much information and suggestions for future development. Owing to the war, no further action could then be taken, but we ask that the report should be again considered in the light of present possibilities.

The British and Foreign Unitarian Association is prepared to give generous help for the purpose of experimental work in large centres of population which have not hitherto had any Unitarian congregation or place of worship; for special services and preachers, and the distribution of literature. If desired, the Chairman of the Executive Committee will visit your Society and meet your Committee to discuss any schemes which you may think practicable and promising.

We are, faithfully yours,
RICHARD D. HOLT, President.
GEORGE W. BROWN, Treasurer.

A COLLECTION OF WATER-COLOUR DRAWINGS.

It is some years since Miss Frances Drummond gave us the opportunity of seeing a collection of her water-colour drawings, but she has been very busy in the interim, apparently, garnering up the visions of beauty which have come to her in woodland, meadow or garden through all the dark period of the war. The result is the delightful exhibition at the Greatorex Galleries, Grafton Street, New Bond Street, where upwards of forty of her pictures will be on view until Dec. 20. We would recommend those of our readers who have not seen them to visit the Exhibition before it is too late. There are imperishable things belonging to the finer part of our nature which we can never afford to ignore, and those who minister at a time like this to our need of creative loveliness are perhaps laying us under a greater debt of gratitude than mere "reconstructors," or—dare we say it?—members of Parliament!

Miss Drummond's vision has, we think, deepened with the years, and although her passion for colour is just as intense, and her joy in the varied beauties of herbaceous borders, rose-gardens, lilled ponds and primrose clumps as pronounced as ever, we are conscious of something new in the silvery atmosphere of 'White Phlox,' the quiet appeal of 'A Waste Corner'—a perfect little parable, if you like to regard it as such—and the sensitive studies of 'Sea Lavender.' One of the latter (No. 4) with its stretches of mauve flowers fading in the distance along a lonely shore under pensive skies is full of a quiet peace and beauty which are indescribably soothing. Other pictures have their own special attractiveness and wealth of colour, notably 'Buttercup Meadows, near Oxford'—deliciously fresh and springlike; 'A Rose Garden' (there are two versions of this); 'Bluebells,' 'A Sussex Farm,' and 'The Garden of St. John's College, Oxford.' There is great charm, also, in the 'Sunk Garden' and 'Shrub Border' of Howth Castle, Co. Dublin, where the glory of masses of bloom contrasts so effectively with the gray walls and dark cedars. They hold the loveableness as well as the loveliness of summer, together with the ordered beauty of the old régime which still makes its appeal even in a time of restlessness like the present, and we confess we envy those whose good fortune it will be to hang them on their walls.

MRS. J. F. SWANN.

THE death on December 4, after long suffering, of Mrs. Swann, wife of Mr. J. Frederick Swann, ex-president of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, takes from the Unitarian community a life-long supporter, and from Wimbledon, where she resided, a generous and indefatigable benefactor. The eldest daughter of Mr. Chas. Holland, of Liscard Vale, Cheshire, and niece of the Rev. William Gaskell and his celebrated wife, the novelist, she was married in 1869, and at once began her philanthropic labours. She specially devoted herself to the sick and the convalescent, and to the care of mothers and babies, and a long list of institutions founded and fostered by her, along with her equally benevolent husband, testifies to services which were assiduously personal as well as munificent. She was an able linguist and a lover of literature and art, and her social circle was very wide. Mrs. Swann was in her 78th year; her family of four daughters and three sons all survive her. A large gathering joined in the service at Oakfield, and attended the interment at Kingston Vale cemetery; the Rev. W. G. Tarrant officiated. Respectful sympathy will be felt for Mr. Swann by the many Unitarians who in past years have shared in the graceful hospitality of Oakfield and its beautiful grounds.

A UNIVERSAL CHRISTIAN CONSCIENCE.

At the meeting in Kingsway Hall on December 3 to consider the need of creating a Universal Christian Conscience in face of the problems of International Reconstruction, Lord Parmoor, who presided, said that if during the war our energies were necessarily, to some extent, restrained in this matter, all one's influence and power ought to be brought to bear now upon the creation of International Peace. They must appeal to the life and teaching of Christ—the fundamental principles of Christian ethics—in such a way as to bring together the largest possible number of Christians irrespective of race or creed. Christianity presupposes the brotherhood of mankind, but there was nothing in this idea inconsistent with a healthy and wholesome patriotism. Love of country and love of nation were not opposed to the brotherhood of man, and in every community both should have their appropriate place and expression. Christianity, however, was a world-wide religion, not the possession of a tribe, a nation or an empire, and properly understood it appealed to the heart and character under all conditions and at all times. It made no distinction in favour of the strong against the weak, of the victorious against the vanquished. There was great need that emphasis should be laid once more on what Christ taught to all—peace, goodwill, charity, mercy and forgiveness. The most practical way in which we could endeavour to make the Christian spirit a real influence in discussing the problems of International Reconstruction, Lord Parmoor continued, was to support in every way the magnificent attitude of President Wilson, who had placed the whole question on the highest possible ground. He had appealed to principles with which every Christian would be in sympathy. But it was quite obvious that he had difficulties in his path, and that there were forces in other countries and in our own which would be opposed to his ideal. Peace, to be perfect, Mr. Wilson had said, must be based upon impartial justice; we must be just not only to those to whom we desire to be just, but to those to whom we did not desire to be just. That was the essence of Christian teaching, and upon it alone, as this great statesman had seen, could we base a peace that was likely to be permanent.

The Dean of Worcester, Dr. Henry Hodgkin, Principal Garvie, and the Archbishop of Athens delivered earnest and forceful addresses bearing on different aspects of the Christian ethic, the last—an impressive figure in his flowing robe with a jewelled cross on his bosom—making himself understood by means of an interpreter. Dr. Garvie, who spoke with great vigour, laid stress upon the fact that the offer of Christian forgiveness was not dependent upon the attitude of penitence—it went out to seek the wrongdoer before he had repented. Our attitude towards those who did evil should be one of intense sorrow that they could so act in defiance of God's love and purpose, coupled with the passionate desire to bring them by every possible means back to a better state of mind. No one who had agonised over his own shortcomings at the foot of the Cross could be in doubt as to the Christian attitude towards sin and wickedness.

Letters had been received from eleven bishops and other well-known people who were unable to be present.

ARRANGEMENTS are being made to have open house in all the Y.M.C.A. huts at home and overseas again this Christmas. The men will be entertained as the guests of the Y.M.C.A.

THE DOMESTIC MISSIONS.

AMIDST the various claims that are made upon the public purse at this season of the year the Domestic Missions will surely not be forgotten. One of our missionaries refers to the "fiercer year of warfare" which, now that soldiers have ceased fighting, is "about to begin," and if we read the signs of the times aright the sufferings of the poor are certainly more likely to be augmented than appreciably diminished in the period of transition which has just begun. The prices of food and clothing, and household commodities of every kind, still remain abnormally high; there is a great deal of sickness everywhere, the vitality of numbers of our people, which has been sapped for over four years by long hours of work, anxiety and sorrow, is low; and many of the simple pleasures which we were able to bring within their reach in former days have necessarily been curtailed during the war. Now we have an opportunity of making up to them in some small degree for what they have endured, and if our help is on a generous scale the Missions will be centres of joyous activities this Christmas for old and young alike. Contributions to the Poors' Purse, and to the Boys' and Girls' Clubs, gifts of money for all purposes as well as clothing, toys, hospital letters, &c., will be gratefully received by the following missionaries: the Rev. A. Golland, Bell Street Domestic Mission, 46, Bell Street, London, N.W.1.; the Rev. W. H. Rose, Rhyl Street Hall, Rhyl Street, Kentish Town, London, N.W.5.; Mr. F. G. Fincham, Dingley Place Domestic Mission, City Road, London, E.C.1.; the Rev. H. W. Stephenson, Blackfriars Mission, Stamford Street, London, S.W.; and the Rev. Gordon Cooper, Mansford Street Church and Mission, Bethnal Green, London, E.2.

At the Annual Meeting of the National Council of Y.M.C.A.'s, it was unanimously agreed to go forward with a National Scheme for Red Triangle Clubs throughout the country, and it is hoped the Churches and Religious and Temperance organisations will co-operate towards this end.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Clonmel.—The death occurred on December 1 of Miss Margaret Orr, and the funeral took place on Tuesday. The Revs. E. S. Hicks and A. Amey officiated at the service held in the house and at the graveside in Rathronan Churchyard. The Rev. J. P. Carter (Wesleyan Methodist) had been asked to assist and was present at both services.

Ipswich.—The Annual Congregational Meeting in connection with the Unitarian Church was held on Saturday afternoon, December 7—a departure, in point of time, from general custom which proved rather felicitous. The chair was taken by M. G. J. Notcutt. The report and financial statement were, as the times would lead one to expect, not very favourable, but a sense of discouragement did not prevail, and suggestions were made as to special ways of clearing off the debt. The minister, the Rev. J. W. Saunders, gave his usual pastoral address.

Irish Churches.—Belfast.—Sapper Jim Neill of 22nd Company R.E., attached to the Ulster Division, has won the D.C.M. for gallantry and devotion to duty in the field. He is the son of Mr. James Neill, for many years the Treasurer of the York Street congregation, and grandson of the late Mr. John Montgomery, also an esteemed member of the church. Glenarm.—The death is announced of Rifleman Thomas M'Killop, Royal Irish Rifles, killed in action in France on September 14, 1918. He was the third son of Mr. and Mrs. Thomas M'Killop of Ballyvaddy. Grey Abbey.—Within a few weeks the death has taken place of three valued members of the church: Mrs. Thane Robinson, Jim Murphy, and Ellie Hamilton. Mrs. Robinson, who has fallen a victim to the prevailing epidemic, had been most regular in her attendance though she lived a considerable distance from the church. Jim Murphy, who was an only son, had been brought up as a lad in the Sunday school, and was rarely absent from the services, while Ellie Hamilton was a member both of the Sunday school and choir. Moir.—On Sunday, November 17, a Service of Thanksgiving for Peace was held at the First Presbyterian Church, and in the evening a United Service was held in the Parish Church, in which all the congregations of the town joined. The service was conducted by the four ministers of the district—the Rev. W. E. Hurst (Rector), T. G. M'Farland (Presbyterian)—Wilson (Methodist), and Wm. Weatherall (Unitarian). Raloo.—The Remonstrant Church has recently lost three of its members by death—Mrs. W. Craig, Carneal, who reached the ripe age of 85 years, and was respected and loved by all who knew her; Miss L. Drummond of Raloo, a lifelong member of the church, who took a keen interest in its welfare, and, as long as health permitted, attended the services and communion; and Miss E. Mahon of Ballyvally, aged 82 years, also a lifelong member of the church, most regular in attendance at the services, and greatly interested in the growth of the cause. Roughfort.—Special protest has been made in regard to the closing of Roughfort National School, which has a fine set of buildings and admirable equipment. It is stated that the closing of the school will lead to the overcrowding of outlying schools in the district and compel many young children to walk a mile and a half, and in many cases more, to obtain any education at all. Dr. Campbell and Mr. F. J. Bigger, who had both been trained in the school, strongly supported the resolution of protest at a recent meeting, and the former referred specially to the late Lieut. John Caruth, the principal teacher in the school, who was killed in action. He suggested that suitable monuments to his memory and to the memory of former scholars who have fallen in the war, and to all other scholars who have served with the British Army, living or dead, should be placed in the school.

Leeds: Mill Hill.—Now that the war is over, the congregation of Mill Hill Chapel is hoping to secure the release of their minister, the Rev. R. Nicol Cross, from the Army as soon as possible, though he is being pressed to remain and act as interpreter. In his last letter from France, Mr. Cross refers to the "dawn of the great day of victory," and gives the following description of the way the good news was received where he was stationed on November 11. "Nothing," he says, "could have been more subdued than the rejoicings of the troops in this part of France. About 11 o'clock on the morning of Monday, November 11, we gathered in front of the church in this village of Rumegies near the Belgian frontier, and at the hour, signalled by a gun, the band struck up 'God Save the King,' then 'The Marseillaise,' followed by one or two other selections, and we dispersed. In the afternoon members of one battalion, with two or three of its young officers, their caps decorated with flowers, and preceded by a very small donkey, paraded the village street; at night there were some illuminations. On Tuesday morning there was a united thanksgiving service in a disused building. It was all very modest, and as for the French people they hung out flags, but they still await the return of their loved ones evacuated by the Hun. Doubtless the moderation on the part of our troops was due to the fact that no intoxicating liquors are procurable, and also that their greatest day of rejoicing will come when they get free of the army and return home to civil life with its liberties and decencies. That will be their day of triumph. They have freed Europe of Prussianism, but still await their own enfranchisement. To them France is not home nor military discipline life or liberty." Mr. Cross continues, in words that should be taken as a warning and a challenge, "I trust that this Christmastide we shall see as never before, while brooding on the titanic agony of this past war, that the direction of human welfare is in the way of Christ, that he must be reborn in and through society for its salvation. There is a great crusade before the Church, and its task is more difficult than ever, for the army and its methods have gone a long way to kill whatever regard for religion the troops had; the majority of them will settle at home with a strong prejudice against religion, so far as they have any concern about it at all, and they, as well as society as a whole, will demand the most convinced and consecrated energies of the Church if it is to remain a power in the land at all."—The Rev. A. H. Coar (U.S.A.), writing from the Eagle Hut in the Strand to Mr. C. H. Boyle, expressed the pleasure it gave him to visit Leeds recently. "The one great thing about our English Unitarian churches," he says, "is their spiritual solidity. There is a reverence and dignity about their architecture and all their public functions which impresses an American most favourably. It is one of the things we in America most sadly need. Over there one feels as if our Church were not sufficiently founded in history. Its congregation shifts so in character, that within a few years a church may be completely transformed, sometimes for the better, but too often for the worse. All this gives an element of transitoriness, a thing I do not like, especially in religion. . . . I am going back to the States with a new and deeper appreciation of the historic continuity and richness of our Liberal Faith. I have always felt in an intellectual way that our principles were the great fundamentals upon which civilisation must be built. I have come to feel this now as well as know it, and for that I have to thank the English people of our Unitarian Churches."—The Rev. C. J. Street occupied the pulpit last Sunday, and preached a vigorous sermon in the morning on 'The Responsibility of the Vote.' He pointed out that although some people condemned any reference in the pulpit to the burning questions of the day the prophets of old spoke without fear or hesitation against iniquity in high places and the oppression of the poor, and Jesus himself pierced to the heart of every private and public wrong and demanded of his followers that they should never rest until a new era of truth and justice had dawned on the world. A "live" Church would awaken a desire in its congregation to do justice to every man, woman, and child, and as a minister he should denounce any injustice or wrong; but when they came to the application of principle to specific problems they must all alike use their own judgment as individuals.

Leicester.—The 52nd Anniversary Services were held at Narborough Road Church recently, Dr. Rattray of the Great Meeting being the preacher in the morning, and the minister, the Rev. Hugh V. Salmon, in the evening. A special appeal for funds was made in view of the need for a considerable addition to the church's sources of revenue to enable the minister and Committee to work more freely, and not under the constant menace of a debt. On the preceding Tuesday a most interesting lantern lecture on 'Some Experiences in Search of Volcanoes' was delivered by Mr. S. Wells, F.R.G.S., F.R.A.I.—The death is announced in the Calendar of Lieut. Philbrick.

Liverpool: Hope Street.—The meetings of the Social Problem Circle continue to draw large attendances. At the meeting on November 6, in lieu of the customary address, there was an informal discussion on 'The League of Nations,' opened by Dr. Mellor, followed by Messrs. J. Gauld, D. Paterson, and R. M. Lott, and others. On the 13th, Miss Margaret Ashton gave a stirring address on the 'Intelligent Use of the Vote.' On Wednesday, December 18, Mr. Geo. G. Armstrong will speak on 'The Churches and the Coming Peace.' Arrangements for the next half of the session are well in hand. There will be seven or eight meetings, of which Dr. Mellor will take three. Other speakers will include Prof. A. Bruce Boswell, Mr. Brailsford, Mr. Lansbury, and Mr. W. Mellor.

Mottram.—The Annual Party in connection with the Unitarian Church was held on November 23 and well attended. The Chapel Anniversary was on the following day, the preacher being the Rev. W. Whitaker of Platt. On Saturday last, December 7, a Concert for Soldiers' Christmas Gifts, organised by the congregation in connection with a Village United Effort, cleared over £20. This year the debt of £200 has been cleared off and altogether about £250 raised outside the ordinary accounts.

Newcastle-on-Tyne: Women's League.—On December 4 a successful Social Gathering in connection with the Women's League was held in the schoolroom of the Church of the Divine Unity, about a hundred friends being present.

Sheffield: Unity Church.—The Calendar reminds the congregation of the pledge which they recited together on Sunday morning, November 17, as an expression of heartfelt gratitude to those who had suffered in the war, and which they hope to renew together a year hence. The pledge runs as follows: "We humbly and willingly dedicate our lives, all that we have, all that we are, to the cause of justice, freedom, and truth. We solemnly declare that henceforth, so witness all present, these eternal principles shall have supreme claim in our lives, and that when endangered, no price shall be too high to pay for their preservation, in this country and throughout the world. We solemnly promise to do all in our power to realise these eternal principles in our individual, social, industrial and national life, that those who have died shall not have died in vain."

A prominent educationist writes:—"I have this day finished reading the book by Jules Fiaux, and think it most excellent. Though less pretentious than the books of Payot and others, it covers the ground well, marks out pitfalls with appropriate danger signals, and holds aloft the light of wisdom and common sense above the psychological chasms which await the average and untutored reader."

OUT OF THE HEART OF THE STORM.

Twelve Sermons preached at Rosslyn Hill Chapel
Hampstead, and Manchester College, Oxford.

BY

Rev. HENRY GOW, B.A.

The sermons are written by one who believes with President Wilson that "right is more precious than peace," and that no personal sorrow or loss should discourage us and turn us from our firm resolve to overthrow the Prussian autocracy. They are written too in the growing confidence that faith in God and in the supremacy of Love has become more and not less possible and real through the conflict and agony of recent times.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

Our readers are reminded that we go to Press on Tuesday in Christmas week. All letters and items of news, therefore, intended for publication in our issue of Dec. 28 should reach the Editor at 13, Bream's Buildings, Fetter Lane, E.C.4., not later than Monday morning, Dec. 23.

LAST year as Christmas was dawning upon us we had to confess that few or none of us had seen one so bitter. The weather itself seemed to conspire with the terrible war conditions of a fourth winter to tax all our resolution. We should be indeed a graceless people if in the changed aspect of things we did not see reason now to summon all our powers of thanksgiving. Though we have not, as Miss Waring's hymn puts it, "all we would," though to "greater bliss" we go, or hope to, we have in comparison with last year's circumstances abundant cause for rejoicing. It would be a fine thing if the newspapers on Christmas morning for once omitted the alarmist, contentious, and malicious matters which are their usual contribution to the matutinal gaiety of nations. If they did it twice it would even be finer. A wise man, at any rate, will have his psalm ready on Christmas morning: "Bless the Lord, O my soul, and forget not all his benefits."

THE great welcome given to President Wilson by the French people will undoubtedly long remain as marking the topmost record in the history of popular receptions accorded to foreign dignitaries visiting Paris. That something of the warmth exhibited was due to a grateful sense of invaluable help rendered in winning the war is obvious; but we believe Mr. Wilson is recognised by the common people as standing more distinctly for democratic government than any other distinguished visitor to their capital. And that a magnificent welcome will be given to him in England we are quite sure; we trust he will be much strengthened by these manifestations in adhering steadfastly to the kind of peace, which his noble utterances have outlined, and to the project of that League of Nations without which all treaties will be sooner or later "scraps of paper."

Judging by certain speeches, and some silences, the President would seem to need all the reassurances he can get of sympathy in his high aims. But we incline to think that the man who took so unswerving a course in dealing with Germany is not likely to prove a weak member of the Peace Conference.

THE Rev. Samuel A. Eliot, D.D., President of the American Unitarian Association, writes that "in these momentous times we think often and affectionately of you and your fellow-workers. Certainly the bonds that unite us were never stronger than to-day." We can assure Dr. Eliot and his fellow-workers that they are often in our thoughts, nor did it require the visit to Europe of the President of the United States, whom we are delighted to honour, to remind us of the debt of gratitude that we owe to the people of America for their aid in bringing the war to a successful end, and to Mr. Wilson especially for placing so vividly before the world those ideals of freedom and right which should inspire and guide the nations.

By an accident which, if it has hurried up donations, we shall not regret we said last week that this week's Belgian Fund list would be the closing one. Not so; the round number, the 200th, will appear in our next issue, and now we confidently ask for a "bumper"—the term sounds appropriately festive, whatever its derivation. Da cito—for the available week is a very short one; da bis (if possible) rather than not at all. Mrs. Bernard Allen and Mr. Drummond, we hope, will tell us in the New Year's first issue what they think about it all.

THE British Commander-in-Chief, Sir Douglas Haig, along with a group of generals brilliantly distinguished in the field, has received a very hearty greeting on his Christmas home-coming. If there had been in his mind or his friends' any thought of a scant recognition of his services, it must have disappeared in the exuberant cheers accorded in the streets, and in the evidently no less cordial reception which he met with from the highest in the land. It is a pity that personal matters cannot be wholly eliminated in public affairs; let us hope the country will hear less of them in the future. And while we acclaim the generals, let us very gratefully, and as far as may be, practically remember as we should the lesser grades down to the rank and file, without whose courage, fidelity, and self-devotion, the victories that rightly bring fame and reward to the organisers could never have been won.

WE have received an urgent telegram from Berne to the following effect: "The Protestant Churches of the Republic of Hungary numbering four millions of adherents implore your protection against the threatening danger of dismemberment. The loss of South-East Hungary with her 1,200,000 Protestants would strike a death-blow to the vitality of these churches and would thereby rob the newly-formed democracies in this part of the world of the most valuable moral and spiritual forces. During four centuries these churches served and suffered as the farthest bulwark of Western Protestants in the East of Europe. Now it is the turn of Western Christendom to save the future efficiency of these churches for the immense task awaiting them." Unitarians in Great Britain have the warmest interest in the preservation and prosperity of their Transylvanian brethren; and we venture to urge upon any of our friends who have political influence that the utmost care should be insisted upon in making territorial arrangements, so that a people who have done so much for religious liberty should in no way be subjected to the perils foreseen.

CONNECTED very closely with the housing question, to which we recently pointed, is a subject which has just been doubly emphasised. Speaking at the London Centre Branch of the National Federation of Employees' Approved Societies Dr. Noel Bardswell said that every year 60,000 deaths occur in this country from consumption, and it is estimated that a quarter of a million persons, mostly of the working class, are suffering from it at this moment. Among the causes of the disease he named malnutrition, sweated labour, impure milk, bad housing, and over-crowding, and ill-ventilated workplaces. We know and rejoice that a great diminution of the disease has already been secured by remedial measures; the fact encourages sanitary reformers to push forward still. The evil is both enormously expensive to life, comfort, and national efficiency, and very discreditable to a land where is abundance of wealth and intelligence. On the same day the London County Council passed a scheme involving a capital expenditure of £108,000 and an annual outlay of £74,000 for special schools for consumptive children. But they need not be consumptive.

MANY of our readers will be interested to learn that the Rev. R. Travers Herford, formerly of Stand, Manchester, and now of the Dr. Williams' Library, London, is to be the "Arthur Davis" lecturer next spring. The series of lectures, of which his will be the second, was founded in memory of a scholarly Jew now deceased; Mr. Zangwill was the first lecturer, and it is a sign of Mr. Herford's wide reputation for Semitic learning that he is selected so early by the Jewish Historical Society, before whom he is to lecture. His subject will be 'What the World owes to the Pharisees.'

* * *

At the moment when the wrappers were being addressed to our 8,000 men in the forces so that the new Lawrence House Bulletin might go to them a considerable batch of letters came to hand from men in Mesopotamia, expressing warmly their gratitude for the issue sent out in the summer. It is delightful to read the many ardent hopes and resolves for the time when the war should be ended; and the thought arises of a really vigorous "onward movement" in our whole fellowship when these men come home. No effort must be too great to give them a special welcome when they do come; meanwhile we all think of them with deeper affection than ever.

PEACE.

My Soul, there is a countrie
Afar beyond the stars,
Where stands a winged Sentries
All skilful in the wars.
There above noise and danger,
Sweet Peace sits, crowned with smiles,
And One born in a manger
Commands the beauteous files.
He is thy gracious friend,
And (O my Soul, awake!)
Did in pure love descend
To die here for thy sake.
If thou canst get but thither,
There grows the flower of peace,
The rose that cannot wither,
Thy fortress and thy ease.
Leave then thy foolish ranges,
For none can thee secure
But One who never changes—
Thy God, thy Life, thy Cure.

HENRY VAUGHAN (1622-1695).

THE WAY OF PEACE.

THE way of Peace begins with goodwill, and it is a gain to have the problems of international peace-making brought into special consideration at a season when thoughts of goodwill abound, at least between private persons. For nations are made of individuals, and national goodwill can rest only on a solid basis of personal sincerity and benevolence of one man to another. Any League of Nations that is to be secure must start with this reality of good feeling. To render it practical in such a world as this, we are well aware that much more than sentiment is needed. The world is composed of people whose conditions and capacities and interests differ widely, and to compose their respective claims needs great dexterity. It must also be acknowledged that the world contains a number of persons whose desires outrun their rights and who are undeniably at times men of ill-will; to curb them and frustrate their evil designs there is need of actual and available strength. But neither cleverness nor force by itself, nor both combined, will avail to protect mankind from the outbreak of wars in the future, unless we begin and continue to be well-meaning to others. Any other start, we may make up our minds about it, is fore-doomed to disastrous failure. The very best-laid schemes and the most formidable array of might will, by themselves, effect nothing to the purpose in the absence of genuinely good intentions.

Now this which on being stated seems so obvious is, like many obvious things, very easily, too easily, ignored—even by men who might be expected to have grown wise by stern experience. To what can be attributed the readiness to foster popular passion by those in political power, or those who seek it, if not to a flagrant disregard of right principles which is as foolish as it is culpable? We believe indeed the great majority of public men are sincere in their declarations of abhorrence of the prospect of another war such as we have seen. To think anything less of them would certainly do them injustice. And yet we have lately heard or read speeches that could never be expected to mitigate, even if they were not designed to foment, a spirit far from propitious for the success of the forthcoming Peace Conference. If the recent hurried electioneering can only be sufficiently forgotten soon enough, the nation may simmer down again from these superfluous ebullitions, and recover its self-possession. If it does not, if there is a continuance of stirring up these fierce passions, whatever justification there may be for them—and we know there has been much—we shall arrive at the most critical period in the history of our times without anything resembling a reasonable frame of mind.

Apart from isolated and, we would hope, uninfluential people, there will surely be an abatement of these misguided and mischievous efforts, and a return to the good sense which we like to think a peculiar feature of our national disposition. The duty of religious leaders is at all times one of casting out evil spirits and bringing vexed and haunted mortals to their right mind. But never was that duty more imperative than to-day. If the Christmas celebration in the churches is to be anything better than a mere survival, depending mostly for its effect upon traditions intertwined with youthful impressions, if there is to be any earnest given of that new temper in religion which is anxiously looked for, surely we shall all emphasise as strongly as possible the claims of "Goodwill amongst men." It will not be enough to say that without it the whole of the future of our race is jeopardised. There is, we know, such a thing as wholesome fear, and one would think that in the past four years men have seen and suffered so much that they will spare no effort to avert the repetition of these horrors. But a higher consideration appeals to us.

Human as we are, there is a nobler side to our nature than that which is concerned with our pains and sufferings. Our ideals of life's excellence, revealed in Poet, Prophet and Saviour, and appealing more or less distinctly to men of every race, plead against these appalling degradations of strife and violence among beings who are so marvellously adapted for mutual service that we are bold to say it was this for which they were made. To enable him to grow clever, man has had ages of the most varied education. To secure that he shall become strong, he has had challenges and tests which have awakened his wits and driven him to discoveries of methods and energies by which his innate native endowment has been infinitely enlarged. To lead him into a state of honourable good faith amongst neighbours he has had ever repeated intimations, of which this last bitter experience of the world is surely the most direct and unmistakeable. As Lord Grey puts it, we must "Learn or Perish"; and the first stage of the lesson for nations as for men is to desire the right, to mean the right, for others as well as for ourselves. If the season's long-familiar songs and fancies lead us more definitely near to that state of mind—shall we say to "the mind of Christ"—they will come as a "day-spring from on high."

THE CHRISTMAS JOY.

"Good tidings of great joy." That was the message from the unclouded heavens on that glorious star-lit night, from the mystic depths, in angel voices; and that is what we want to realise to-day. Consider what it really means. The beautiful old legend must have had its birth in the poet-heart of some early disciple, moulded partly out of the interpretation of ancient prophecy, and partly out of the glowing imagination of the disciple himself. But what gave it vitality, and makes it still the vehicle of vivid truth to us to-day, was the fact that the joy was there, as it may be with us here, and that the power of the new life was stirring in the hearts of those who were gathered into the fellowship of Christ. It was the joy of a liberated heart, strong in the confidence of the purer, nobler life, that poured itself into that story and heard the choir of angels break upon the silence of the night with the irsong of "glory to God and on earth peace and goodwill."

The message had come to the poor and neglected and cruelly wronged in that ancient world, to the despised slave, to the over-wrought mechanic; and it came afterwards to those who had the world's goods and whatever the society of that age could give, but who yet were not satisfied, but were longing for the breath of a purer moral life and some deeper conviction of religious truth. The message came as good news indeed, of life victorious over death, of goodness over evil. It came to the Jewish Christian through his faith that Jesus was the Messiah of his people, long expected of the prophets and now actually come, though by the bitter way of the cross ascended to the heavenly places, and to come again in heavenly glory to establish the perfect rule of God on earth. And to the Greek and other heathen converts it came, who recognised in Jesus the son of God, the "man from heaven" of Paul's belief, type of the spiritual sonship to which all men were called. But whatever the form of the belief, before the doctrine there had been Jesus himself, the actual life of the "Chief of faithful souls," inspiring as a teacher, friend of the poor and oppressed, healer of disease, who with new power and tenderness, speaking of the Father in heaven, opened the way of forgiveness to the penitent, and to many hearts became the quickener of faith and love, a purer spirit of life. To those who learnt of him he became the heavenly friend, who bound his followers together in a new brotherhood, in devoted loyalty, and with a new and far deeper love of God as the Father in heaven. It was this new manhood, looking up with exulting confidence to the light and love of God, that made the joy of the angels' song, and this it was that really conquered the world. The weary found rest, the sick at heart a new and glorious hope, the dead were made alive again. In those little gatherings of the disciples throughout the empire it was known that the gentle and merciful, the peace-makers, the pure in heart, and those that hungered after righteousness were blessed. It was known, not because it was written in a book or because the words of Jesus were repeated to them, but because the thing itself was in their hearts and they found that it was true.

Even the slave gained a new dignity in his humble confidence, and the power of his forgiving love, before which his master stood abashed; and many a time the learned and the man of the world and the woman of society learnt from the ignorant and lowly the truth and power of the good news, seeing and feeling what the new life had made of them; for there it actually was, in their hearts, pure and helpful and rejoicing. It is not argument that is needed, but simply the kindling of the heart to love the better things, to dare to hold to truth and honour, to suffer, if need be, for the right, to love pure goodness in all simplicity, and all beautiful and noble things. For that is the life, which triumphs over the world, and in the fellowship of Christ, who first showed the way, rejoices with a great joy.

It is the life that gives the vision and the confidence and the joy; and this is what has always made an open way for the Gospel. The doctrine has been in many forms; the life of the children of God, in Christ's spirit of love and trust, a true, pure manhood, has been one and the same.

Wherever the missionary has gone out to carry the good news to those in the darkness of ignorance or savagery or sin, this has been the real secret of his power. Can we doubt that what prevailed was the impress upon untutored hearts, and those hungering for better things, of the new power of life, the breath of a truer manhood, quickened in every generation in the followers of Christ? For so it has been, not only with the first missionary preaching of the Gospel, but with every reformation of a corrupted Christianity; the vital thing has been a return to a better loyalty and greater simplicity of obedience to the true spirit of life, the spirit of love and trust, of self-sacrifice, of pure brotherly kindness and eagerness in well-doing, in those who have learnt in Christ's way to do the Father's will and trust in the Eternal Goodness.

That is the secret of life and joy, however hard the way may sometimes be. It is no idle word, common-place as it may seem, but the deepest spiritual truth, that in the spirit of kindness and goodwill which marks the Christmas festival, in doing kindly things, in a generous, forgiving, eager spirit, making for helpfulness and trust, for friendship in the highest sense, lies the way of life. By this simple way we may find our talisman of peace and joy, and it opens out to knowledge of the deep things of God, in quietness and confidence and deepening happiness, to the light that will shine more and more unto the perfect day.

Let any one who will test the truth of this. Try, even with some difficult effort to surrender to that happier spirit, to do some helpful thing, to forgive an injury, to overcome some ugly strain of envy and jealousy, or of ill-nature in the heart, to be generous and really care for others and think of them with gladness, rather than of self—and at once the witness of truth is there, and it is the truth of God; for we are not our own but his, and in spite of all that darkens faith, makes love difficult, it is his world in which we live. It is the surprise of joy that comes, and the angel voices that bid us look up, and see, though it be from afar, the vision of peace, and "glory in the Highest." V. D.

THE ALTAR OF MERCY AT ATHENS.

Statius Thebais XII. 481, et seq.

OUR friend, Mr. C. W. Mellor, formerly Indian judge, and now connected with the congregation at Brighton, who sends the following translation, says that, "While it may, perhaps, claim to be sufficiently accurate, it is only a faint and blurred reflection of the beautiful poetry of the Latin original."

An Altar in the City's centre stands,
No Great God's shrine, but Gentle Mercy's seat,
By Misery made sacred. Hither comes
A stream of suppliants. No prayer is met
With blank refusal—all who ask are heard,
At any moment of the day or night
Access is granted, and with sympathy
The Goddess listens to the tale of woe.
Scant is the ritual—no sacrifice
Of victims' blood—no incense—burning torch
Would be acceptable. The Mourner floods
With tears the Altar; then he shears his hair
And hangs it up above; and leaves his clothes,
A poor memorial of grief assuaged.
Trees that denote kind feeling stand around
The suppliant's olive, and the filleted bay
Revered by all. No effigy is there,
No metal could be trusted to present
The Deity's form; for in the heart she dwells.
The place is thronged by those who live in fear,
A squalid crowd. The happy know it not.
The Sons of Hercules, so legend says,
Saved by the City's arms, when their great Sire
Died and was raised to heaven, in gratitude
Founded the shrine. But this falls short
Of what
The truth demands. We cannot but believe That these same visitors celestial, whom
Our Athens ever welcomed—just as they Revealed the new man, law, and sacred rites,

And gave the fruitful seeds, which dropping hence
Enriched the earth—so too for suffering men
A common refuge built, where rage and threats
And tyrants dare not come; while Luck and Chance Retire afar; for only Justice rules.
This Altar had already gained renown
In many lands. Hither the conquered came,
And kings dethroned, and exiles far from home,
And criminals, who in ignorance had sinned.
There they all met and prayed for Rest and Peace.

BOOKS AND REVIEWS.

PICTURES IN THE LIFE OF THE MASTER.

QUITE naturally the writer of 'By an Unknown Disciple' (Hodder & Stoughton, 6s. net), wishes to remain anonymous, for the book purports to be the personal narrative of a follower of Jesus whose name has not come down to us. It does not pretend to be in any sense of the word a Life of Christ, though it aims at giving in a series of autobiographical chapters the impressions which we may well imagine would be formed by one who was constantly with the Master of his teaching and personality. Such records are often dreary failures, only of interest in so far as they bear testimony to the perennial fascination of the Gospel story and the universal desire to enter into a fuller realisation of the events it chronicles. In this modest volume, however, quite admirable within its limits, and written with great sincerity and sympathetic insight, a helpful interpretation has been given to many of the difficult parables and sayings of Jesus which should be of value to many earnest-minded people who know little of textual criticism, but are anxious to get at the ethical implications of Christianity.

The Jesus pictured in these pages is an eminently gracious figure, full of infinite kindness and immeasurable compassion, whose anger is as swift and startling as the lightning's flash, and whose irony is sometimes mirthful, sometimes sad, but never tinged with malice. The author of 'By an Unknown Disciple' often detects the ironical note in Christ's sayings where some of us may not have suspected it before, and he is probably quite right in speaking of the quiet laughter in the Teacher's eyes when he was provoked—not yet beyond endurance—by the Scribes and Pharisees. The divine gift of humour could not possibly have been lacking, we feel, in one who saw so deeply into the heart of man. For the rest, the descriptions of the towns and villages in which Jesus sojourned and of the mountain scenes amidst which he taught the multitudes are quite well and simply done, and we realise better after reading them what Capernaum looked like, and the camel caravan crossing the desert, and the galleys unloading at the quayside of Ptolemais, and the long line of the surf on the seashore going towards Tyre. The narrative gains in impressiveness, as it should do, towards the close of the book, and we commend to students the chapter dealing with the real causes which led to Christ's death. We may mention—and it is an interesting and hopeful sign of the times—that the chapters of 'By an Unknown Disciple' have already appeared as a series of papers in the columns of The Nation.

A LITERARY MISCELLANY.

WHETHER you can create a passion for literature in young minds by presenting them with a varied selection of extracts from great writers, thus offering them the "varied excitements (and incitement) of miscellaneous reading" at one meal, as it were, is open to doubt. Some of us have always had a genuine dislike for the popular Reader, which aims at improving one's taste under the pretence of arousing interest, and often spoils the finest "pieces" by putting them into a setting which is entirely unsuitable for them. The diet is an artificial one, at best, and not always productive of a love of books. But, of course, a process that seems distasteful to one early addicted to the habit of acquiring "complete works" and of reading everything enthusiastically from cover to cover, may well be found of great use in developing literary curiosity in the minds of young people less studiously inclined, and we ought to welcome any sound method by which they may be weaned before it is too late from the evil of browsing too continuously among the columns of the daily press. Who, indeed, could have a word to say against such an excellent production as the 'Cambridge Readings in Literature' (University Press, 4s. or 6s. a volume) when one turns over the well-printed pages that provide such a feast of good things, even though an opening sentence like this, "On the day appointed for their spousals the church was surrounded by an inconceivable multitude" (Smollett) or "Abraham had lived out the measure of his days" (Old Testament Legend), or "When he awoke Martin found himself in a soft downy bed in a dim stone chamber" (W. H. Hudson), does give you the feeling that you have been dragged into the story by the hair of your head, and that you ought never to have arrived at these intimate details without some previous knowledge of the persons they concern? As a matter of fact, it is delightful to have such a wealth of entertainment in two handy volumes (five are actually in contemplation though only I. and V. are to hand), and the editor, Mr. George Sampson, is to be congratulated on the catholicity of his taste no less than his excellent judgment. You turn as easily from Southey to Dr. John Brown, from J.M. Barrie to Edmund Burke, from Coleridge to Tolstoy or G. K. Chesterton as a certain worthy vicar slipped from "Mahomet to Moses," and there are reproductions of well-known pictures by Turner, Burne-Jones, Raeburn, Holbein, Dürer, Watts, and others to add the stimulus of art to that of literature. We are sure that many grown-up people, whatever boys and girls "of twelve and above" may do, will revel in these volumes, and welcome the opportunity of reading selected passages—sometimes of great length—from the works of famous poets and prose-writers whose books are not, as yet, upon their library shelves.

THE new number of the Lawrence House Bulletin has been sent out this week to nearly seven thousand soldiers and sailors belonging to our churches and schools. The addressing of the envelopes has been done by ladies belonging to the congregations at Hampstead, Finchley, and Brixton; and by Mrs. Bartram, Miss Hargrove, Mr. R. M. Montgomery, and Mrs. A. A. Tayler. The Bulletin has been sent on this occasion to the home address where known, as recent changes in the disposition of the troops render the military address less reliable than usual. A few ministers and secretaries of churches are most painstaking in keeping Essex Hall informed of names and addresses; but there are several from whom no list has ever been received. Men connected with these churches have sometimes expressed surprise to their comrades that they have been overlooked, as others have expressed their gratitude that they were remembered.

This issue of the Bulletin opens with words of greeting from the Editor (the Rev. W. G. Tarrant); and the special feature of the number are the verses by the Rev. J. L. Haigh, Miss L. G. Ackroyd, and the Rev. C. J. Street. The Prayer for our Country, 'Lord, while for All Mankind We Pray,' is set to music. There are pictures of Mr. Ronald P. Jones in the act of the "Swallow Dive"; of the Revs. W. H. Drummond and H. Gow; and an excellent group of ministers and delegates present at the Autumnal Meetings of the Association at Gorton Manchester, in October last. 'Quiet Thoughts' and 'Lighter Touches' pages are provided as in previous numbers of the Bulletin.

JOHN MASEFIELD.

THERE is one kind of preaching so much more effective than any other that it might almost be called the only kind. It is that which consists in right living. What men need is to see religion... This embodiment of truth in a living form is, according to Christianity, God's own especial method. He made his highest revelation, not through a philosophy or a code of laws or a book, but through a man. The truth was lived in Jesus. "The Life was the Light of men." G. S. MERRIAM.

The Shepherds on the lawn,
Or ere the point of dawn
Sat simply chatting in a rustick row ;
Full little thought they than
That the mighty Pan
Was kindly come to live with them below :
Perhaps their loves, or els their sheep
Was all that did their silly thoughts so busie keep.

MILTON.

It is hard to admire and love those that are half-alive ; people that speak feebly, laugh feebly ; people whose great study in life is to invent rules and regulations, primness and proprieties, all of which are so many weights laid upon the fulness of life. ... Christ came to make men full of pity, love, gentleness, and hospitality. He came to make the soul alive ; and, remember, a man's soul is alive, in the spiritual sense, only when he loves goodness and does goodness ; for the love of goodness is the love of God, and the doing of goodness is the keeping of the commandments of God.

Sit, Jessica : look, how the floor of heaven
Is thick inlaid with patines of bright gold ;
There's not the smallest orb which thou

But in his motion like an angel sings,
Still quiring to the young-eyed cherubins ;
Such harmony is in immortal souls ;
But while this muddy vesture of decay
Doth grossly close it in, we cannot hear it.

SHAKESPEARE.

CHAQUE être peut arriver à l'harmonie :
quand il y est, il est dans l'ordre, et il

représente l'éternel.

No book is worth anything till it is worth much; nor is it serviceable until it has been read, and re-read, and loved, and loved again; and marked, so that you can refer to the passages you want in it as a soldier can seize the weapon he needs in an armoury, or a housewife bring the spice she needs from her store.

WHY, what is there to prevent beings of another order from being as cheerful, as social, as good companions, as the very liveliest of God's creatures whom we have known in the flesh? I KNOW of no greater luxury than that of thinking well of my fellow-men. It is a luxury which a person in narrow circumstances, who is compelled to live within the limits of strict veracity, sometimes feels to be beyond his means. I THINK we may look upon our little private war with death somewhat in this light. If a man knows he will sooner or later be robbed upon a journey, he will have a bottle of the best in every inn, and look upon all his extravagances as so much gained upon the thieves—and, above all, where instead of simply spending, he makes a profitable investment for some of his money, where it will be out of risk of loss. So every bit of brisk living, and, above all, when it is healthful, is just so much gained upon the wholesale filcher, death.

SOUTH AFRICAN NOTES.

NATIVE UNREST.

IN South Africa the native question is always with us, as indeed it may well be, when we remember that the proportion of natives to Europeans is something like five to one. But of late years an uneasy feeling has been steadily growing in the minds of thoughtful observers that South Africa is unconsciously drifting towards grave racial conflict. This, at any rate, is the feeling amongst the members of the South African Society for the study of native questions. It is not merely that there is a conflict of opinion on many important questions such as Segregation, the Natives Land Act, Pass Laws, Franchise disabilities, Liquor Laws, Location administration, and conditions of labour. It is rather that the whole atmosphere, and the spirit and attitude of mind in which the two races regard and approach each other may make conflict inevitable. On the one side there is a rapidly deepening distrust, on the other the contempt of the superior race for the inferior and the determination to regard and use the inferior race merely as hewers of wood and drawers of water. And this position has arisen despite the fact that the Government and Parliament of the country may be described as not unsympathetic to the native—if he will only "keep his place" and be an obedient serf or servant. But that is just the difficulty—the native will not "keep his place." A new spirit and new ideas are in the air, and the native demands more and better education, greater opportunities of development, more freedom, more land, a less restricted franchise, more self-government—and so on. He is denounced as "impertinent," "uppish," "conceited," and he replies with the cry of "Down with white Junkerdom," or becomes morose, resentful, and distrustful.

This question of "atmosphere" and "spirit" is important, and perhaps I can best illustrate it by a comparison. If all the immigrants in South Africa had been men of the type and spirit, say, of William Penn, Dr. Livingstone, or Dr. Moffat, obviously there would have been no native unrest as we have it to-day. These men went to their respective colonies and missionary fields not with the machine-gun and the whisky barrel, not even with the object of making money by native labour, but animated by a desire to educate, uplift, and Christianise the people amongst whom they laboured. Their spirit and influence still lives—the spiritual influence which prompted the native followers of Livingstone to carry their master's dead body on their shoulders through scores of miles of bush and forest to the coast so that it might be sent over seas to be buried in Westminster Abbey. Over against that spirit consider the spirit of the average immigrant—the spirit which, even at its best, is concerned mainly with the task of earning a living, and concerned about the native only in so far as he helps towards this end, and which, at its worst, comes to make money and is not very particular how it makes it, establishes forms of contract and conditions of farm and mine labour which are little better than modifications of serfdom, or even introduces usury and the liquor traffic and all their accompanying vices and diseases into native life. Obviously, the higher spirit and the circle of ideas and feelings which it represents must invade and permeate the lower if South Africa is to be saved from racial strife and conflict.

There are finer influences at work—witness that exceedingly able book by Dr. C. T. Loram on 'The Education of the South African Native'—a book which I hope to write about some other time—which disposes once for all of the foolish dictum that education spoils the native.

But during the past few weeks two other answers have been made to this problem of the permeation of the lower spirit and circle of ideas and feelings by the higher, and it is to these answers that I wish to draw the attention of the reader. A few months ago there was a certain amount of native unrest in Johannesburg. A strike took place, the natives concerned were haled before the magistrate, a man of more than ordinary fairness and soundness of judgment, but who, in this case, delivered a judgment which was so obviously unjust and accompanied by remarks which, under the circumstances, were so unwise, that the incident called forth protests from every party in South Africa. The incident shows how difficult it is even for a fair-minded and judicial official to keep his mind and judgments free from race prejudice and race bias. However, a Civil Commissioner, Mr. J. B. Moffat, a descendant I believe of Moffat the missionary, was appointed to investigate the whole trouble and to report. His report has just been issued and it forms an answer, or one of the answers, to this question I have raised as to how to penetrate and permeate the lower circle of spirit and feeling by the higher. After enumerating various genuine native grievances, suggesting a more sympathetic administration of the law, and various ways and methods of getting to know the native mind by frequent Conference, he writes as follows:

"As long as natives are denied the rights of citizenship as Parliamentary voters there can be no real contentment in the country. There is little prospect of their being granted these rights in the Transvaal, Natal, and the Orange Free State within the near future. In these Provinces therefore it is necessary to provide means by which the natives resident therein can voice their views and wishes."

That is one answer to the question I have raised—Parliamentary representation of the native, or, failing that, some form of representation through Provincial and Native Councils.

But there is another answer to the question, and it is an answer on which I wish to lay stress because it illustrates the peculiarly complex nature of our difficulties. It is an answer which has been made by Mr. Percy W. Bunting, the son, I believe, of the late Sir William Bunting, one-time editor of the Contemporary Review. Mr. Bunting contends that though political representation may help, it will not solve our difficulties. The belief is rapidly spreading that Parliamentary Government is not the highest form of democracy. Certainly it has not solved the question of the rights of minorities, nor the problem of the relation of the worker to his work, and, through his work, his relation not merely to the State but to mankind at large. And so Mr. Bunting contends that in addition to the political representation of the native there must be some form of industrial organisation, some guild or industrial union through which the native, along with all other workers, white or coloured, can exercise a voice in the control, the ordering, and the development of his life and work and of the conditions under which he labours.

This, it will be observed, goes to the root of the matter. It is real democracy. But now, will it be believed that, because Mr. Bunting has set himself to advocate this as a possible solution of our difficulties, he, too, has been haled before the magistrate on the charge of causing disaffection amongst the natives and "inciting to public violence." The mere fact of the prosecution is enough to take away the breath of the average industrialist—outside South Africa. It takes us back to the dark days of industrial slavery, of the early nineteenth century with its suppression of trade unionism and the rights of combination. Well might Dr. Krause, the Dutch barrister who defended Mr. Bunting, say: "We whites were the greatest hypocrites out. Even the politicians were hypocrites. On the public platform public men declared that it was the duty of the whites to raise the native. But they could only do it by rising from the ashes of inconsistency. Mr. Bunting and the Socialists went against the politicians. They said: 'Teach the native the ordinary rules of education and life. Show him his power as a producer from labour. Show him how to use that power for the betterment of the whole of civilisation. Learn to build up, not to destroy.' If the white man was entitled to use the weapon of the strike, not as a weapon of violence but as a moral right, why was the native barred from that privilege?" Despite this eloquent pleading, however, Mr. Bunting and his associates were committed for trial at the Criminal Sessions.

But now the reader will naturally ask—If the Government is not unsympathetic to the native how could it bring itself to allow such an outrageous prosecution? And the answer is—and it is big with Fate—blindness, stone-blindness to the fact that the native has the same or similar aspirations, instincts, desires, personality and soul, as the ordinary white human being—spiritual qualities which absolutely forbid him to "keep his place," that is, to acquiesce in the condition of perpetual servitude.

But now, to show how confusion becomes worse confounded, let me point out that Mr. Bunting and his associates are not very enthusiastically supported even by those who have won the rights of combination for themselves—the white workers. They refuse to allow coloured people or natives to enter their craft-unions. They fear, and rightly fear, so long as society is based on its present rotten foundations of individual and class selfishness, that the competition of coloured and native labour will bring down the standard rate of wages and so degrade the standard of living.

As for the old theory that the native is a child and must be treated as a child, that too has gone or is rapidly going. The native is a grown and developed human being—with all his faults and darksome habits thick upon him—seeking further development. Of the child theory let the Rev. Arthur Shearley Cripps, our best South African poet, speak:

IN STATU PUPILLARI.

"He's but a child." You say so, do you not,
To prove his need of stripes, to prove your right

To lock his land away, and to requite
His work with wages of a child? You blot His franchise out. You mildly murmur—
"What

Use has he for a vote? His needs are slight;

His name upon a hut-tax roll indite,
And tax his blanket, too, or cooking pot."
A child? He bears the burthen and the heat

Of grown men's war. (How fast child-porters die!

Who forced their labour? halv'd their pay? let ply

The hippo-hide?) A child! Your task how sweet—

To speed on blood-trails child-Askaris' feet,

And set babes' hands to murder, standing by!

MEMORIAL NOTICE.

MR. ROBERT STEWART, GLASGOW.

ON Saturday, 7th inst., Mr. Robert Stewart, at the ripe age of 80, died, some weeks after a serious operation, at the house of his son-in-law and daughter, Mr. and Mrs. William Sinclair of Sheffield. Mr. Stewart was a member of the Glasgow (St. Vincent Street) and Sheffield (Upper Chapel) congregations, and, through his keen interest in denominational affairs, was well known to Unitarian friends in many parts of the country. The cremation service at Sheffield was conducted by his old friend and pastor, the Rev. C. J. Street, on Wednesday, 11th inst.

Mr. Street said they were assembled to pay a tribute of respect and affection to the memory of a man whose individuality was remarkable. For thirty-five years he had been privileged by a warm friendship with Mr. Stewart. Never was a more virile personality. He lived to the full in every moment, and made use of every ounce of his power. Responding at his great age to the call for national service in war emergency, he went back from his well-earned retirement from inland revenue service to do a young man's hard work in the Bank, besides indefatigable effort in the cause of Belgian refugees; thus setting an example to men of half his age, but perhaps at the same time overtaking his strength. He maintained an alert interest in all that concerned the welfare of mankind, and was keenly interested in the Unitarian denomination and the cause of free religion all over the world. His was a progressive spirit, without a trace of the hardening process which so often accompanies advancing years. He was an observant traveller and a delightful companion; for he was an all-round reader and thinker, with a well-stored memory, and was ever apt with fitting quotation from the best of English literature, whether in poetry or prose. Along with it went a keen sense of humour, with a faculty for evoking laughter that left no sting, and awakening happiness which remained a pleasant memory. Even in the nursing home, after his serious operation, though in much discomfort, his cheerful spirit asserted itself as usual, bubbling over with life, intent on keeping abreast with the movements of the times, and full of interesting conversation. He refused to be daunted by death, regarding this mystic visitant as no enemy, but a friend, and he quietly made preparation for eventualities. The vigorous spirit was now free from its encumbrance to participate in that fuller and richer life which his happy faith anticipated.

CORRESPONDENCE.

UNITARIAN HISTORICAL SOCIETY.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—Owing to the abnormal cost of production the Transactions of this Society for 1918 is a smaller issue than its predecessors. It is hoped to give fuller measure in the next issue. A biographical sketch of one of the ejected ministers, by Messrs. Ernest Axon and Francis Nicholson, and an article by the Rev. Clement E. Pike are already in hand for the next number. Those who have not yet paid their subscription for 1918 will greatly oblige by forwarding it to the Hon. Treasurer, Mr. R. M. Montgomery, 5 Crown Office Row, Temple, E.C.4, before the end of the year.—Yours, &c.,

RELIGIOUS INFLUENCES IN LIVERPOOL.

[FROM A CORRESPONDENT.]

A noticeable thing in Liverpool has been the holding of common religious services during the war, called together by the Bishop. Most of the clergy and ministers have gathered on a common platform under his presidency, each taking his share in the religious offices, followed invariably by the reverent attention of a vast crowd of Liverpool citizens. The Exchange Flags, St. George's Hall, the Central Hall, have all been the scene of these assemblies. On every occasion "the sea of upturned faces" was a sight to see and to remember. The Bishop himself, whose self-devotion and intense activity have never flagged or faltered under his poignant bereavement, has been an inspiring and consolatory force throughout. It might surprise him to know how real his "Fatherhood in God" is now to many who cared little enough for the historical or ritual side of his office before he and they faced death and woe together; how he has vindicated Christianity to them by being what he is; how his spiritual leadership has brought home his spiritual certainties to hearts that were and are far from being ecclesiastically minded.

This war has been full of surprises—especially of spiritual surprises. One of them is the mental attitude the Bishop of Liverpool has wrought about himself in those who perhaps never thought about him before at all. The writer remembers an occasion of a service when the day was very dark and hearts were heavy and fearful. Various notables were present, military, naval, civic, and many people waited about at the conclusion—but not, it seemed, for these. They were waiting for the Bishop; and when he had passed they followed behind him, a pathetic and silent procession. His small white-robed figure, bearing so bravely that invisible burden, seemed a pledge and symbol of the reality of unseen things, things he made simply and practically true. A Shepherd indeed.

Another outstanding personality in the religious life of Liverpool is the Rev. Dr. Guttery, without whom a religious assembly has come to seem incomplete. He has just returned from his mission to the United States, and received a great welcome home. His influence far outsteps the bounds of Primitive Methodism. Last Sunday week an immense congregation over-flowing all available space in body and galleries reached its limit in the pulpit itself at the back of the preacher, and listened to a message delivered almost in a whisper; for, as he said, he has left most of his voice in the United States. Yet every word was audible. On Monday the Church was again packed for his lecture on the tour, and supporting him were the Lord Mayor, the American Vice-Consul, and Archdeacon Howson, who at the conclusion pronounced the benediction. A lecture as packed as the audience, notably demonstrating one cause of his popularity—a most delicious humour and shrewd wit. Thank heaven, it was possible to laugh once more without a sense of incongruity. But one hopes he will take care of his voice. It is one of the assets of Liverpool.

THE Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter, Litt.D., will conduct the closing service of the Little Portland Street congregation at University Hall, Gordon Square, on Sunday, December 29 at 11.15 A.M., and a special invitation is given to all who have been interested in the congregation in past years.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Bootle.—In the Bootle Free Church Calendar the announcement is made that Private Joseph Johnson, aged 19, 116th Battalion, King's Liverpool Regiment, was killed in action on September 26 in France, although the news did not arrive until the armistice negotiations were in progress. He was formerly a member of the Sunday school, and had since become a member of the church. The death is also much regretted of Mrs. Cheetham, wife of Private H. Cheetham, R.A.M.C., B.E.F.

Colne.—Owing to the unsatisfactory state of health of the Rev. J. Pipkin, Minister of Stanley Street Unitarian Church, the congregation have unanimously decided, on the recommendation of the Church Committee, to release him for three months from January 1 next, with full salary. Mr. Pipkin greatly appreciates this offer and has gratefully accepted it. The Church Committee hope to be able to arrange for ministerial supplies during the minister's absence.—On Saturday, November 30, a Sale of Work was held in the school with the object of clearing off a debt of £187. In the absence of Councillor Hird, the Rev. F. Hall of Blackburn performed the opening ceremony, and Mr. Richard Landless of Colne presided. During an interval between the concerts which had been arranged a Gold and Silver Tree was unveiled by Mrs. Smith, wife of the Rev. C. Smith of Nelson. A sum of £130 was cleared after expenses were paid.

London: Islington.—On Saturday, December 7, the sum of £37 towards Unity Church expenses was realised as the result of a successful Japanese Fancy Fair in the Preston Rooms, which was opened by Miss Mary Preston. An excellent programme of music had been arranged.

Reading.—A venerable member has passed away this week in the person of Mrs. Suffield, the widow of the Rev. Robert Suffield, the "Father Suffield" to whose unique influence as a Catholic priest and missionary striking testimonies have been recorded, and who as Unitarian minister at Croydon made a distinguished mark. Mrs. Suffield, who was a sister of Mr. Herbert Bramley of Sheffield, took a keen interest in our denominational life and till late years was frequently seen at our gatherings. She died last Monday.

Stockton-on-Tees.—Mr. W. J. Watson, J.P., has been closely identified with the Unitarian Church at Stockton-on-Tees ever since the present building was erected; and it is gratifying to learn that during his fifty years' service as Clerk to the Local Board and, since 1892, Town Clerk of Thornaby-on-Tees he has earned the confidence and respect of the community. Mr. Watson has now retired from the office of Town Clerk, and the Mayor expressed the gratitude of the Town Council for his long and faithful services, and the hope that he would enjoy his well-deserved leisure.

Wolverhampton.—All Souls' Church has sustained a very heavy loss through the death of Mr. W. H. Harris, Church Treasurer and Superintendent of the Sunday School, at the age of 64 years. Mr. Harris was devoted to the work of the school and his influence over the children was quite remarkable. The funeral service held in the church and conducted by the Rev. J. A. Shaw on December 11 was largely attended by members of the congregation, scholars, teachers, and prominent citizens of the town. Mr. Harris leaves a widow and one son who is serving with the colours in Mesopotamia.

* THE INQUIRER welcomes items of news likely to be of special interest to its readers, and is ready to pay for such news when accepted by the Editor, the scale depending upon its importance and suitability in form and matter for insertion. All contributions should be addressed to the Editor, INQUIRER Office, 13 Bream's Buildings, London, E.C.4, and should be received not later than the first post on Wednesday morning in each week.

Hospitality for Overseas Soldiers.—Several of our readers, in response to the note which appeared in our columns a few weeks ago, have offered to provide hospitality for a few days about Christmas to soldiers from Canada, Australia, and New Zealand. Their letters have been forwarded to Lieut.-Col. C. S. Bullock to deal with. Nearly all the offers have come from friends living at a considerable distance from London; and it may not prove convenient for men on leave to travel so far. We are most grateful to those who have so generously responded to our note,

MARRIAGES.

COLLETT—HAMBLIN.—On December 10th, at Friars Street Church, Ipswich, by the Rev. J. W. Saunders, M.A., Robert James Collett to Elizabeth Teresa Hamblin.

CROSSKEY—NETTLEFOLD.—On the 18th inst., at the Church of the Messiah, Birmingham, by the Rev. Lawrence Clare, Lieut.-Col. John H. Crosskey, M.C., son of the late Percy W. Crosskey and Mrs. Crosskey, of 54 Portland Road, Edgbaston, to Evelyn Margaret, eldest daughter of Mr. and Mrs. John S. Nettlefold, of Winterbourne, Edgbaston, Birmingham.

DEATHS.

SMITH.—On the 12th inst., at Thornlea, 47 Palatine Road, Withington, Manchester, in her 80th year, Margaret Barton Smith (née Little), wife of the late Samuel Smith. Was cremated at the Manchester Crematorium on Monday, 16th.

SUFFIELD.—On December 16th, at her residence, 42 Craven Road, Reading, Madeline, widow of the Rev. Robert Rodolph Suffield, and daughter of the late Edward Bramley, of Sheffield.

COLLIER.—On December 16th, at White House, Hueclecote, Gloucester, Edward Collier, aged 58.

Character-Building Thought Power.

Paper, 9d. net.

In 'Character-Building Thought Power,' Mr. Trine demonstrates the power of mental habits, and shows how by daily effort we may train ourselves into right ways of thinking and acting.

'In Tune with the Infinite' is the most important of Mr. Trine's books. Its object, in the author's own words, is "to point out the great facts and laws underlying the workings of the interior, spiritual, thought forces, to point them out so simply and so clearly that all can grasp them, that all can take them and infuse them into everyday life, so as to mould it in all its details in accordance with what they would have it, is the author's purpose.

OUT OF THE HEART OF THE STORM.

Twelve Sermons preached at Rosslyn Hill Chapel Hampstead, and Manchester College, Oxford.

BY

Rev. HENRY GOW, B.A.

The sermons are written by one who believes with President Wilson that "right is more precious than peace," and that no personal sorrow or loss should discourage us and turn us from our firm resolve to overthrow the Prussian autocracy. They are written too in the growing confidence that faith in God and in the supremacy of Love has become more and not less possible and real through the conflict and agony of recent times.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

All letters and manuscripts for the Editor should be sent to 13 Bream's Buildings, Fetter Lane, London, E.C.4. They must reach the Editor not later than Wednesday morning for publication the same week.

SINCE receiving the telegram concerning our Hungarian Unitarian friends which we printed last week we have news that Prof. Boros, of Buda-Pesth, is now in Holland with a view to enlisting aid to avert the threatened calamity to his religious community. The position is one of the gravest anxiety, and both in this country and in the United States there will be many who, knowing the fine character and truly liberal mind of Prof. Boros, and desiring that the Transylvanian seed-plot of religious liberty shall not be trampled into ruin, will earnestly wish to co-operate as far as possible with his efforts.

* * *

IN many churches on Sunday last, being "Peace Sunday," there was special emphasis on the need of a League of Nations as the best means of securing mankind from a repetition of the miseries and shames of the last four years. A powerful reinforcement of the proposal will be given at once by a united campaign of the Trades Union Congress and the Labour Party. On Thursday, January 2, a meeting will be held in its support at the Albert Hall, and on January 5, which is to be observed in Labour circles as "League of Nations Sunday," similar demonstrations are to be held in Glasgow, Manchester, Birmingham, Newcastle, Cardiff, Leeds, and Bristol, while in many other places representative gatherings will be held in co-operation. We heartily rejoice that this vigorous policy has been adopted.

Two points included in a series of resolutions passed by the Wesleyan Methodist Committee of Privileges for transmission to the Government deserve the attention of all who are seeking to rouse and educate public opinion in connection with the Peace Conference. In addition to an earnest plea for a League of Nations and a consequent reduction of armaments and the abolition of Conscription, the Committee urge that complete religious toleration should be insisted upon in all countries to which the protection or support of the Allied nations may be granted, and that "effective and drastic" measures should be taken in regard to the sale of alcoholic liquor to native races in territories coming under the control of the Allies.

* * *

PASTEUR EMILE ROBERTY, senior minister at the Oratoire, Paris, from whose sermon on the eve of the Armistice we quote on another page, is regarded by the Reformed Churches of France as one of the finest pulpit orators in their country. We can well believe it. His brilliant sermon at the Cathedral in Geneva, on the occasion of the meeting of the International Liberal Congress at Geneva, 1905, will live long in the memory of all who heard it. Another of his memorable utterances was that delivered at the Jerusalem Kirche, Berlin, five years later. Short in stature, but lithe and graceful in action, he makes a figure as picturesque as his eloquence is spiritual and exalted. We rejoice to know that our distinguished confrère was selected to preside over a widely representative assembly recently held in Paris, when delegates were present from the Protestant churches of the Allied nations. It was a regret to him that his Unitarian friends in England could not be represented.

It is with sympathetic interest, which will be widely shared, that we hear from our old friend the Rev. James Hocart of Brussels, formerly minister of the Liberal congregation in that city. Mr. Hocart, whose health had been but weak for some time, says that at first the feelings roused by the cruel treachery of Germany towards little Belgium stimulated him to new life and unwonted exertion, and he was actually able to do a great deal of work for the afflicted people around him. But after two years and a half, his efforts had exhausted his whole strength, and having suffered an entire collapse he remains in a very feeble condition. Let us hope that the dawn of a brighter day for his country will more happily supply the invigorating touch again.

* * *

"THOUGH she was a Churchwoman by practice, her own religion was a kind of undefined Unitarianism." So Mr. G. W. E. Russell writes of the late Edith Sichel, the biographer of Alfred Ainger and a writer on many subjects, none of which she touched without adorning. Mr. Russell quotes her as saying: "The Immanence of God and the life of Christ are my treasures."—"I am a heretic, you know, and it seems to me that all who call Christ Master with adoration of that life are of the same land." James Martineau was one of her favourite theologians. We all meet with people counted among the worshippers in orthodox congregations whose opinions are like hers, though she had a pungent way of expressing them. "She had nothing but scorn for a 'joyless curate prating of Easter joy with limpest lips'" — a sample which we ourselves remember very well hearing on a Mediterranean steamer. Nor did she care for "the Athanasian creed sung in the highest of spirits in a prosperous church" by "sealskin-jacketed mammas and blowsy old gentlemen." But, she said, "All the clergymen in the world cannot make one disbelieve in God."

* * *

THE council of the London Congregational Union is appealing for £40,000 to be raised as a Peace Thanksgiving Fund and applied in furthering the denomination work in the metropolis. The appeal says that more than 20 churches in London pay stipends of less than £200 a year, that at least 25 are crippled by heavy debt, and that 9 are in temporary and rapidly deteriorating buildings. The proposal is to increase the annual income of the Church Aid Fund by £1,000 so as to augment the stipends, to clear off the debts to improve the premises, and provide for the religious needs of new districts.—The Bishop of London has also made an appeal for £50,000 on behalf of the distressed (he says starving) clergy of his diocese. The average stipend is said to be £300, but many have considerably less—in some cases, about half the amount—to live on. With the price of necessities of life doubled there is undoubtedly, beneath the superficial appearance of “plenty of money about,” a great deal of pinching and privation. And it is not only the clergy that suffer but all whose income, being fixed, is unequal to present prices.

* * *

THAT somewhat misunderstood society, the British Academy, which has hardly had time since it was founded to establish a reputation equal to its title, has at least done valuable work in the direction of popularising archaeological results, especially in connection with the Bible. Its series of Schweich lectures, which deserve to be more widely known, have been given by men of the first rank in this department of science, and are published at a rate placing them in everybody's reach. Attention has been called to some of them from time to time in our columns. We are glad to note that Sir Frederick Kenyon, the director of the British Museum, has announced that the Academy is about to ask the Government to secure the proper organisation and co-ordination of archaeological work in the Bible lands now thrown open to British control.

* * *

WE are glad to hear that the Rev. P. Godding (Lieut. R.I.) has safely returned home after being a prisoner in German hands since May 27. How deadly the fighting was on that day and the subsequent sufferings may be judged from the fact that only two officers of his company survive and only six of the whole battalion. The privations endured in his prison camp were very severe, and his services as chaplain had to be minimised for a time owing to the great reduction of his strength. Happily he is now in good health, thanks in great measure to parcels—of which he reckons he received about half of those dispatched to him.

* * *

AT the biennial meeting of the American General Conference of Unitarian and other Christian Churches last year, a bronze tablet was presented by the delegates to our church at Montreal to commemorate “the first meeting of the Conference on British soil,” and to mark the century of peace that had elapsed between the British Empire and the United States. A replica (in wood) of this tablet has been now placed in a prominent position in the entrance hall of the Unitarian headquarters in Beacon Street, Boston. We cannot doubt that for long years to come this interesting memorial will be welcome to the eyes of visitors from all parts of the States, in one generation after another. It will certainly receive fresh significance from the new ties of warm friendship which have been knit during the war.

FOR EVER MEMORABLE.

PLUTARCH tells us that when Alexander had heard an oration by Callisthenes on the prowess of the Greeks he said, quoting from Euripides, “On noble themes 'tis easy to excel.” If that is so, to what heights should not England's poets rise when they undertake to do for the close of the war what they copiously did for its opening! Two hundred and fifty years ago, John Dryden, “Glorious John,” found inspiration in the stirring tale of one year; what would he have done with the story of four, and such a four as we have seen? His ‘Annus Mirabilis’ would become a ‘Quadriennium Mirabilissimum,’ and its wonder—if that poor word must be used where none is equal to the thing—would be immensely more than four-fold that of 1666. Patriot as he was, we cannot be surprised that he found matter attractive in the long-drawn-out sea fights which the summer of that year witnessed between our fleet and the Dutch, or that—full-blooded Englishman as the bard was—he should revel in the exploits of heroic daring reported from the seas. But think how all the poet in him would spring to the record of our times, when, on a scale never known before in the annals of mankind, effort, valour, suffering, have taken million-shape, and when sea, land, and air alike have presented scenes of heroic struggle, fateful to multitudes, and decisive of the life of empires. We recall the pleasant note of Samuel Pepys—“I am very well pleased this night [February 2, 1667] with reading a poem I brought home with me last night from Westminster Hall, of Dryden's, upon the present war, a very good poem.” Well, perhaps it is; it certainly was so reckoned by the poet's contemporaries, though it is not his best. To hear the “long-resounding pace” of his mighty couplet, his “two coursers” as Gray calls them “of ethereal race, With necks in thunder clothed,” we must turn elsewhere. May be, after all, that “wonderful year” had not stirred the deepest depth of his heart and consequently had not called forth the full strength of his genius.

What of our living singers—or writers in prose for that matter, for “glorious John” was equally a master in both kinds? Of course there is a recoil in the mind of any man really human against theatrics in a matter so awful in its tragic reality. If any writer should set out to show his cleverness by verbal posturings on these ruins of civilisation, these graves of the unnumbered dead, he may possibly receive his reward in the plaudits of the shallower sort. We are not thinking of that kind of thing. But if there were any one of the moderns who could utter sincerely the thoughts and emotions universally evoked by these stupendous events, it would be a priceless gain to us and all posterity that the utterance should rise level with the theme. We look round and wonder where a fit voice might be found—perhaps our best are pondering even now whether to attempt a theme so immense, Hardy, Bridges, Newbolt, Noyes, Masfield, and the rest. As they view the subject we should like to take their opinion as to the correctness of Euripides' dictum, “On noble themes 'tis easy to excel.” No doubt there are episodes that any one of them taken at random might be trusted to handle effectively—for example, the long tireless activity of the sailors, of the Royal Navy or the mercantile marine, the dauntless pluck of the lads that dribbled their footballs into the face of the German guns, the romance of the flying men, or—to turn in another direction, but one where memorable things are surely to be found also—the toil of the workers, men and women alike, the patience of organisers, shall we not add the demonic energy of a Lloyd George. Any of these would certainly be theme enough, yet how much more belongs to the whole story!

One aspect of the grim struggle is brought more clearly home to us as we drift day by day from its actual experiences. More than once, indeed, we heard, as the daily tumult went on, voices telling us that it was a battle not between individuals and armies alone, but between ideas. Did not the Kaiser himself, in the latter period, emphasise the fact? Two “systems” were in death grapple; according to our respective positions on the field we might call one or the other Ormuzd or Ahriman, the Power of Light, or the Power of Darkness. But here, in soberest truth, we have the superhuman element, real, not fancied, brought into the drama. Of old, from Homer onwards, the poets pictured such interpositions in forms now gone antiquated. If Kipling were to borrow Dryden's paraphernalia and tell us of shadowy things winging about the battle-ships, agents of destiny to mortals and the world, he might as well appear in Covent Garden dressed like the older singer when on his way to Will's coffee-house. And yet Kipling, who had some serious things to say to his countrymen after the fading of the pageant of the Diamond Jubilee, might surely find suggestion still, or even more than formerly, in the contemplation of this rising and falling of all physical things, including the terrible pomp of war. “Lest we forget,” will not some great clear utterance come to us, will it not echo in every pulpit in the land, reminding us that these things visible and tangible, the outward life with its triumphs and piteous sacrifices of men, are but as a thin veil, the thinnest to the discerning mind, of an eternal and spiritual world? We are all too prone to play the part of “valiant dust that builds on dust,” to yield ourselves to the illusion that “reeking tube and iron shard” are the ultimate realities, the last appeal of the wise, while they are really but a snare of the foolish. “Lest we forget,” even now as the last of the war years ends, may some merciful inspiration come to the hearts of all of us, and especially to those whose “frantic boasts” have but exposed their blindness. Plutarch goes on to say that Alexander bade the panegyrist of his victorious troops rather try a harder path to excellence. “Tell my Macedonians their faults, that by means of them they may learn to be better for the future.” Mankind has deep need to learn and to remember well.

BOOKS AND REVIEWS.

A SYRIAN ON SYRIA.

IN spite of the ready assent with which the principle of the self-government of little peoples has been received during the war there is only too much evidence that the old traditions of the great Powers are still very strong, and proposals are glibly made as to the future of one and another of the liberated nationalities which are very far from resting upon the "free consent of the governed." In connection with the Holy Land another factor is introduced, in the fascination which Zionist schemes have for many minds. Palestine was the Land of the Jews; what can be more attractive, say some good people, than the idea of "restoring" the Jewish nation to its old home? Especially influential with a few but by no means negligible Bible readers is the conception of the "fulfilment of prophecy" in some such way. That there can be any other side to the matter does not seem to occur to them, but the book before us* shows unmistakably that there is a very important other side.

The Rev. A. M. Rihbany, the author of this book, is a native of Syria, and one of some quarter of a million immigrants from that country into the United States. He is evidently a man of much power and skill as a writer, and he has attained considerable celebrity in the pulpit. But though doubtless exceptional in talent himself, he is able to point with great satisfaction to the average Syrian in the States as an intelligent and law-abiding citizen. He therefore claims that due attention should be given to the rights of those inhabitants of Syria, including Palestine, who are not of Jewish stock, and who by long descent have ancestral ties equal to those of the Jews, while by actual inhabitation they are surely to be considered before strangers, however historically interesting.

The complexity of the problem of Government in that ever-memorable land is augmented by very stubborn facts. The comparative sterility of the land itself is one thing; another is the difficulty of defining its boundaries; but most important is the great variety of tribes and religious culture which are to be found in it. Under the severe tyranny of the Turk there has been little or no opportunity for these diverse elements either to develop individually or to mingle in successful union. For any foreign Powers to select one of these and set it over the rest would be the least hopeful way to amity between them; and, the author contends, the introduction of a large number of Jewish immigrants into the country with the idea of establishing an independent Jewish polity would be as politically unsound as it would be economically disastrous. His mind is an open one as to the defects of his fellow Syrians, but he tells us much to encourage the hope that by the judicious and benevolent supervision of a Power, seeking not its own advantage but the good of the governed, they would speedily take rank with any other oriental race. Such a tutelary Power he cannot see in Europe, though he courteously acknowledges the several excellences, e.g., of French and British control. His plea, urged with great earnestness, is that his adopted country, encouraged by its success in the administration of Cuba, should go farther and try to carry out its great ideals of human freedom and elevation by undertaking the task of "ruling" a free Syria till it can wholly rule itself.

The author's perspicuous mind, as well as his trenchancy of expression, will be best discernible in a quotation or two. In speaking of 'The Pride of Race' he says:—

"The kinship of blood remains the social and political bond of the Near East. It is the centre of its clannish life and the limitation of its religious spirit. Clannish divisions persist and are vital even within the same religious fold, and the various sects are mutually opposed political parties. The long succession of tyrannical rulers in Eastern countries and the Oriental's indifference to organisation have prevented the formation of a national ideal and the recognition by the various elements of the population of a common national interest, transcending all clannish and sectarian loyalties. Therefore the modifications which nationalism has worked in the racial sense in the great countries of the West have not yet come to soften the clannish and sectarian rigidities of the East.

"But even in Western countries ungenerous racial prejudices remain strong. I do not allude only to the Teuton's insane passion for a subject-world wherein the Teutonic 'Kultur' might be inculcated as the noblest culture any race has known. The superior air of the Anglo-Saxon is too evident to be overlooked, even when he is fighting for the liberation of the world. This noble son of humanity, who has fought countless battles for liberty and law, and is the greatest nation-builder the world has known, remains to a great extent intoxicated by the idea of his own racial superiority. His tendency to look down upon other races, especially the Asiatic, is still very strong. He looks down even upon those races for whose welfare he is willing to shed his blood. A great paradox, but not utterly strange. It is a striking evidence of the ancient struggle in the same race between the provincial man and the universal man.

"But the Anglo-Saxon does not realise, perhaps, that those races, even the Asiatic, while recognising his superior achievements in certain lines of progress, feel disposed also to look down upon him. At least they are not convinced that they deserve his scorn. What is there in the logic of things to prevent any race from raising itself in its own estimation to a high elevation and looking down on all other races? Nothing whatever....

"The Oriental, also, feels that he is of superior quality, that he has a 'right' to look down upon even the Anglo-Saxon. Why not? What difference can there be between the 'right' which the Anglo-Saxon feels certain that he has to look down upon the Oriental, and that by which this man feels himself entitled to look down upon the Anglo-Saxon? Is not the whole thing a question of personal opinion, since neither party accepts the other party's position? The Syrian knows that he has given Europe its religion, the crowning glory of all human possessions. He claims to be more spiritual and more hospitable than the Anglo-Saxon is; that his friendship is truer and of a deeper spiritual quality, his women more modest than Western women, and his social life in general less encumbered by the many cares for material things which weigh down the social life of the Occidental.

"Unimportant whether all these claims are valid or not. They are made by the son of the East with the same self-assurance that he is right which characterises the Anglo-Saxon claimant to racial superiority. Both are needy of the grace of God."

In pressing his point that the United States would prove the best guardian and political educator of the Syrians Mr. Rihbany says:—

"So far the European nations which have associated with the peoples of the Near East have been either unable or unwilling to minimise, or destroy, those prejudices which have afflicted the Easterners for so many centuries. How could they, when they brought similar feelings with them? By their own mutual contentions and their seeking of 'spheres of influence' by seductive appeals to the sects and clans of the East, the Europeans have served, at least indirectly, to confirm the Easterners in the errors of their ways.

"Now America has a nobler appeal to make to the East. I do not say that racial prejudice has entirely disappeared from among the Americans. No. Unfortunately it still exists, but in a greatly modified form. The American Anglo-Saxon has not entirely outgrown this habit of his race but the New World has weakened it in him very materially. His own declaration that 'all men are created equal' has served him as a new and quick conscience. He cannot ignore the dictates of this conscience without breaking the fundamental law and weakening the basic principle of his own social and political existence. He does sin against this Goddess of Democracy now and then, but always within the range of quick repentance."

Our readers will see that this is not a plea easily to be set aside. It was written before the armistice, but its opportuneness is certainly not lessened by the close approach of the Peace settlement.

TRANSYLVANIA.

IN view of the anxiety of the Protestants of Transylvania over their future position the following passage from a chapter by Dr. R. W. Seton-Watson, in 'The War and Democracy,' is worth recalling. "Certain it is that Roumania, while declining all temptations to join the Central Powers, has also rejected the Russian invitation to occupy the Bukovina, and has actually approached Hungary with a view to securing the restoration of Transylvanian autonomy. The Magyars on their part have tried to buy off Roumania by introducing the Roumanian language of instruction in many of the State schools of Transylvania—a wholly inadequate concession which would none the less have been inconceivable four short months ago. [Published December, 1914]. Unfortunately, the realisation of Roumanian unity involves the inclusion in the new State of considerable Magyar and Saxon minorities, amounting in all to not less than 600,000 inhabitants. There are no means of overcoming the hard facts of geography, but it is essential that Roumania, while incorporating Magyar and Saxon islets in the Roumanian racial sea, should guarantee the existing institutions of the two races, and the fullest possible linguistic freedom in church, school, and press. The Saxons in particular have preserved their identity for over seven centuries in this little corner of the Carpathians, and have contributed far more than their share to the cause of culture and progress in Hungary. It would be a crying irony of fate if they were allowed to perish in the twentieth century at the hands of those who have pledged themselves to vindicate the rights of smaller nationalities." To the word "church" is appended this note: "The Szekel (Magyar) districts of Transylvania are mainly Calvinist, the Saxons Lutheran to a man, while the Roumanians are divided between the Orthodox and the Roumanian Uniate Churches. Transylvania is also the centre of an interesting sect of Unitarians, who are for the most part Magyar by race."

A CORRESPONDENT draws attention to the stimulating and suggestive essay by the late Prof. Verrall on the subject of the 'Altar of Mercy' referred to in Mr Mellor's translation from Statius published in our last week's issue.

EMILE ROBERTY AND FRANCE.

ON November 10, the eve of the signing of the armistice, Pasteur Roberty delivered a most impressive sermon at the Oratoire, Paris, taking as his text Psa. lxxxv. 8: "God the Lord... will speak peace unto his people and to his saints; but let them not turn again to folly." An excellent translation, from which the following passages are taken, appears in The Christian World Pulpit for December 18:—

Honour to the Heroes!

"Victory is not an excuse. Victory does not necessarily indicate and bring in its train the betterment of a people, nor the elevation of its national conscience. The mind must have been completely Germanised that can feed itself on such an illusion. Besides, should we not betray in some sort our mission as a minister of Christ if we declared to you only the eternal mercy and joy which await believers, and never its severe warnings, never its words of condemnation? We should betray even the sentiment of our entire people if in these memorable days we tasted only the intoxication of deliverance. Yes, we shall do well to flag our houses to-morrow in honour of France and of its splendid Allies. Honour to you, sons of England and of Scotland, of Australia and New Zealand, of Hindustan and of Canada; to you, sailors of the countless fleet of the British Empire, who, during four and a half years on all the seas of the globe, in spite of the monsters that lurked under the surface, have assured the very existence of Western civilisation! Honour to you, citizens of the United States, who, by thousands and thousands, have crossed the immense ocean to defend an ideal! Honour to you, children of light-bathed Italy, who have inflicted mortal strokes on what remained of the Empire of Charles V. To you, natives of Africa, inhabitants of our Colonies, who came to shed your blood, and for the most part to die, in the chill fogs of our climates. To you, Serbians, doubly sacred by misfortune and by victory, Rumanians deserted and betrayed, unfortunate and unhappy Russians, who during more than three years have strewn with your corpses the plains of Eastern Prussia, of Galicia and of Poland. Honour to you, Belgians, and to your King, who, in slackening the thunderous march of the enemy sacrificed your country to keep your word, and so contributed the first to the salvation of our country.

"Lastly, glory to you, dear Poilu of France! Ah! we can never find words to celebrate the heroic tenacity and the ardour of your attacks. You, who almost alone at the beginning of the war, on the heights of Nancy, on the Yser, in Champagne, in Artois, at Verdun, and twice on the immortal Marne, vanquished the most formidable material Power of all time. Yes, we shall do well to put out our flags, but we shall do well also to drape all our flags with crêpe. Crêpe, the sign of suffering and of mourning. Mourning, for deliverance means much more than grief for the dear departed. It is an appeal for looking into oneself, over one's life, one's conduct, over the life and conduct of one's country; it is a preaching of repentance, of all salutary humiliation."

The preacher, in his examination into the life of his nation earnestly denounced the spirit of Atheism which had no sense of God, or of obedience to a transcendent, eternal, immutable moral law such as must condemn many habits of the French people. One of their "follies" had been to set aside the Bible as a religious help, and to set aside Christ the Lord. Another was "the stupid materialism which would lead us to the abyss as surely as the rivers of hell." British and American help had been bountifully given to France, "but," he asked, "what is the solid foundation of the British or American riches? What use do the cream of the citizens of these countries make of their wealth? Do they employ it with a view to an egoistic enjoyment or for truly public good? Have they not in its highest degree the sense of the idealist, social, and finally Christian utilisation of the power of money? The British and American élite—I speak naturally only of the élite—has kept intact at the bottom of its conscience the love of the Kingdom of God. There is the truth. On the other hand, the enrichment and the practical materialism which some among ourselves preached to us, under charming forms, it is true, and sometimes with voices—the pity of it!—so musical, is the simple cult of Nature; it is the blind confidence in the natural powers of our race, the unrestrained expansion of our desires, the idolatry of our genius. Yes, the idolatry of ourselves, with the eloquence which such an attitude gives to the tongue. The idolatry of the genius of the race! You see where it has led Germany, which, for fifty years intoxicated by its victories, turned away from the precepts of the Gospel to place its whole hope in material force alone, no longer keeping its piety, only the miserable formalism of the Pharisee. Do you wish now to resemble them, to give to the French race an idolatrous cult, and thus to found your whole future on practical materialism, even with much literature, art and music? That would make useless sooner or later our magnificent victories. It is then that it would be possible to say that our brothers and our children have sacrificed their lives and their health in vain.

"My brethren, we have given you here only some indications, some subjects for reflection—above all to you, the young survivors of the war, on whom we count to organise, discipline and moralise our democracy. Let not one of the qualities of our race be lost. Let not a ray of its beauty be extinguished in the shape of a puritanism fearful and narrowed by morbid scruples—although salvation may perhaps still lie rather in excess of this kind than in the contrary excess. Let not one of its pathetic impulses be stifled, but since God gives us to-day the victory and speaks to us of his peace, let French democracy 'not fall back into its follies.' Amen."

AT LINCOLN'S INN GATE.

(Over the great arch is inscribed "Anno Domini, 1518.")

NAY, mark it, Soldier; ere thou take thy way

For home, America, and peace once more,

Think that bold Cabot barely theretofore

Had coasted north and dared thy wintry Bay

Dauntless,—not dreaming, he, that on a day

Four centuries thence, of London's four-times-four,

Thou and thy mates should eye our ancient door

Blithely incurious, nonchalantly gay!

Welcome, and fare thee well; yet with thee take

Thoughts of a City old ere thine was new,

Memories of men who for dear Freedom's sake

Dared, and still dared, as great adventurers do.

And shall not we, united, voyage through

To Freedom's goal, who share the speech they spake?

HEALING BY COLOUR.

THE colour of life, the colour of flowers, colour as the artist and poet know it, colour that is "rest of heart," colour symbolism, even colour sounds and colour-music—what a wealth of beauty and gladness the words conjure up! It is impossible to imagine what existence would be like without colour—the green glooms of the sea, the purple of the fells, the "daffodil dawns" of June, the sky's field of azure, the buttercup's shining yellow, and the flushed petals of the wild rose. The colour-sense is, we know, lacking in some people, just as the capacity to understand musical harmonies is lacking in others. There is a queer passage in one of Galton's books about Quakers and colour-blindness which caused the writer real affliction of heart years ago, when she was greatly attracted by the old Friends' habit of wearing grey, and loved beyond everything the soft and subtle shades that are mixed with silver rather than with gold. The fact remains, however, that consciously or sub-consciously we are all snared in the iris-tinted mesh of beauty which makes the poet catch his breath and causes the lover to tremble and sigh. The earth (to change the metaphor) is literally soaked in colour—warm, glowing, of a wonderful depth and clearness; colour is as much a part of the religious consciousness as the idea of diffused light, and those great artists of an earlier day were surely right when they painted the hosts of heaven with wings of blue, and scarlet, and saffron.

This being so, why should it surprise anybody to hear that colour has therapeutic value? It does surprise people to hear it, though the idea was, we believe, familiar to the ancient Egyptians, and is implied in much of the occult teaching of the East. It is, moreover, and this is what matters in the West, based on scientific research and observation, and has so far converted the high officials at the War Office—the last people in the world, we imagine, to be led astray by mystical theories which have no utilitarian purpose—that "colour treatment" has been practised for a considerable time in some of our military hospitals for cases of neurasthenia and shell-shock, and the theory of it has travelled as far afield as South Africa, where some interesting experiments along these lines will probably be made before long in the treatment of men and women who are mentally afflicted.

Those of us who have thought a little about the marvellous interplay of mental and physical forces, who have grasped the divine fact that everything in the universe is permeated with the same magical quality of life, and find no oddity in Chesterton's conception of a God who makes daisies over and over again, millions of them, apparently for the sheer joy of it, tipping each tiny white ray with pink as tirelessly as if it were the morning of the First Day—those who have had these experiences find it quite easy to believe that the vibrations of certain clear, beautiful colours, judiciously used, with scientific knowledge and due regard to light and space in the wards where the scheme is tried, are marvellously beneficial in their effect upon sick and ailing minds. "Sunlight yellow" for the neurasthenic whose thoughts are set in a minor key, and who is absorbed in melancholy reflections upon his own sad case—well, it has an inviting sound, and we know of certain charming little rooms set apart for particularly "difficult" patients which, even on the dullest day, remind one of spring, of bluebells in the woods, of sunshine on a grassy bank, and cowslips in "a cup-like hollow of the downs." In dealing with the therapeutic properties of colour we have to guard against the tendency to read æsthetic values into the prescriptions of the colour healer, who is not primarily concerned with artistic effects. But it is part of the perfect fitness of things that all the colours which are used curatively in the wards where cases of nervous breakdown and shell-shock are now being subjected to the methods discovered by Mr. Kemp Prossor have exquisite associations which make them acceptable to us for quite other reasons than those which he would put forward. For instance, "anemone mauve" and "firmament blue"—the former a mental sedative, the latter such an aid to concentration of thought and purpose that all ceilings ought to be coloured with it rather than whitewashed—have a simply delicious sound, and conjure up intoxicating visions of a Southern spring, quite apart from the fact that when used together they are valuable for those who suffer from insomnia, nervous headaches, or malaria. Nevertheless, we are not, it seems, to allow ourselves to be led away by the beauty-loving temperament in this matter any more than when we are dealing with the X-ray treatment of disease, and, needless to say, those who are responsible for the restoration to health and happiness of thousands of our disabled men are not likely to be captivated by a merely charming theory the sole value of which lies in its power to flutter the artistic coteries.

To reduce the matter to simple words, if that is possible, Mr. Kemp Prossor, who has given himself untiringly to the study of this subject and has put his services gratuitously at the disposal of the authorities during the war, asserts that the colours with which we are surrounded have a beneficial or harmful effect upon us which is more strongly marked when we are not in a state of normality or health. Different people, of course, require different colours or combinations of colours, and, moreover, they require these colours in different proportions. The neutral-tinted, inert mind must be stimulated and rendered active; the strong, positive, too-energetic nature must be soothed and tranquillised. It is most fascinating to hear Mr. Prossor explain how a certain type of morbid child for whom the tonic qualities of strong sunlight-yellow are necessary, though he probably dislikes it very much, has to be gradually accustomed to larger and larger "doses" until he is able to take deep draughts of this life-giving colour. On the other hand, those whose nerves have been over-excited, or whose emotions are easily stirred and liable to become violent, must on no account be subjected to the influences of colours such as red, in some cases blue, which have a rousing and stimulating effect. Cases of physical fatigue, of brain-fag, of loss of function owing to the inhibition of fear, all the various forms of laziness and what we call "cowardice" have to be carefully diagnosed and treated accordingly, the dominating idea being that of co-ordination, the "toning up" and harmonising of the whole personality in such a way that right conduct shall follow lucid thinking to the enrichment and development of the man's whole being.

Those who have been through the colour-wards in the officers' quarters at the Maudsley Neurological Hospital at Denmark Hill, where some of Mr. Prossor's best work has been done, must have felt that they were, indeed, looking through magic casements into a world of the future where humanity will walk free of sickness and fear, and where, at last, we shall understand what the visionaries have tried to tell us of those mysterious and subtle forces which have always been available for our use from the beginning of time, had we not been ignorant of their marvellous potency. After all, progress is still in its infancy, and most of us will go on talking for a long time of "reconstruction" while the supreme Artist is clothing the flowers of the field with a loveliness which is beyond our power to create. Nevertheless, it is possible that the poets and painters and music-makers will prove to be the practical men in a more enlightened age, rather than politicians, and public officials, and men who make wars, and when we weave their many-coloured dreams into the fabric of our national life we shall get the right impulse for all our activities at last.

BISHOP HENSON & BISHOP CROFT.

THE announcement that the present Bishop of Hereford is about to issue a new edition of 'The Naked Truth' which his predecessor in the diocese, Bishop Herbert Croft, published in 1675, has a more than antiquarian interest, as will be recognised by students of Unitarian history. The date, thirteen years after the passing of the Act of Uniformity, falls within a period when discussion on religious toleration had a very practical bearing in the direction of a wider comprehension in a national Church than that Act allowed. But the discussion also had a theoretical bearing also, and, as is well known, Croft's book led the way to a long and vehement controversy in which the doctrine of the Trinity was specially involved. Describing himself as "An Humble Moderator" he exposed the failure of compulsion to secure uniformity, and he proposed to set up the Apostle's Creed as the one sufficient standard of Christian faith. The primitive Church, he showed, accepted the simplest form of confession of belief, and that ought to be enough for later Christians. Scripture, in itself a complete rule of faith, should have been the sole rule; but unfortunately the Church had followed the lead of the Fathers, who being in many cases philosophers had brought into the Gospel their "school terms and dearly-beloved sciences." If Constantine had carried out his intention to forbid in Christianity the use of any but Scripture terms we should have escaped such discussions as the Arian and Athanasian.

In addition to this point, Bishop Croft showed the vacillation of the Reformers in respect of the authority of the Fathers, and their consequent difficulties in meeting the arguments of Roman Catholics. All the Fathers, he contended, were liable to err, nor were the Councils, however early, guaranteed against mistake. And, while ceremonies had their uses, it was surely unwise to exaggerate their importance and force them upon unwilling and scrupulous people. That the Bishop had some vigour of style is evident from his reply to those who said the white surplice was an emblem of righteousness: "Not surely such dirty nasty surplices as some of them wear, especially the singers in the Cathedral."

It was an age when such vigour was popular. A brother Bishop, not altogether brotherly, wrote a reply entitled 'Lex Talionis, or the Author of Naked Truth Stript Naked,' in which Croft was likened to Judas, saluting Episcopacy and then betraying it. But this was only one of the answers to his surely well-meant plea for Christian breadth of sympathy. One of the most notorious was written by Samuel Parker, a renegade from Independency, who ultimately succeeded in attaining the see of Oxford. Andrew Marvel satirised Parker's attempt unmercifully. Of Croft's book he declared whoever read it must wish to have been its author.

It will be interesting to observe the sequel to the bold venture of Bishop Croft's latest successor.

A MESSAGE of goodwill, numerous signed by writers, scholars, and other public men, has been sent at Christmastide to the German people.

THE LATE MR. L. WOODHEAD.

On Sunday, November 3, a special service was held at Cape Town in memory of the late Mr. Lawrence Woodhead, M.L.A., and of those members who had died during the pestilence. Mr. Woodhead, whose death was reported in our issue of October 19, lost his life through the sinking of the S.S. Hirano Maru. He had been Treasurer of the church for some years and was well known throughout both the city and the country as an honoured and public-spirited citizen. His position as a member of the House of Assembly, as ex-President of the Chamber of Commerce, as a worker in the cause of education, and as Treasurer of the Charity Organisation Society, showed the esteem in which he was held by his fellow-citizens. At the Memorial Service, the Rev. Ramsden Balmforth spoke of the great loss which the church and the community had suffered by the death of Mr. Woodhead. He was a man who seldom spoke about his religion, but he showed it in his character and lived it in his daily life. It shone out in his high sense of honour and in his gentlemanly spirit. Whenever he differed from others he never allowed his differences, whether political or religious, to interfere with his personal friendships, or with the courtesy which was part of his sterling nature. He was no shirker of duty or of the sacrifices which duty requires. Both in his private and his public life he was animated by the same spirit, the same high service of duty and something more than duty—of generous and kindly human feeling. His death, and the circumstances of it, showed the fearful deeds to which men would descend when they placed the dictates of their rulers or the interest of their country before the laws of humanity and of God. It was a part of that sacrifice and agony of mankind by which humanity was striving to create a spirit which would prevent the possibility of war and of the hideous deeds and indiscriminating judgments which issued from it. Towards that ideal Mr. Woodhead had contributed his quota of service. At the close of the sermon, in which Mr. Balmforth also referred to the death of the many members through the pestilence, the congregation rose as a token of respect and reverence for the dead while the organist played the Dead March in Saul.

NOTES ON SOME RECENT BOOKS.

[A short Notice in this column does not preclude a review in a later issue.]

By an Unknown Disciple London, Hodder & Stoughton. 265 pp., 6s. n.

A review of this book appeared in our columns last week.

Cambridge Readings in Literature: vols. 1 and 5; ed. by George Sampson. Cambridge, University Press. 249 pp., 288 pp., 4s. n. each.

These books have already been noticed in our issue of December 21.

Rihbany (Abraham Mitrie) AMERICA SAVE THE NEAR EAST. Boston, Mass., Beacon Press. 164 pp., $1.

The author, known in the States as a liberal preacher and writer, among his books being one on the Gospel story which has exceptional interest as coming from a Syrian, here gives valuable information respecting his native land and urges that it should be placed under American control. His case is presented with much force and skill, and certainly demands the close attention of politicians.

Russell (Right Hon. G. W. E.). PRIME MINISTERS AND SOME OTHERS. Fisher Unwin. 345 pp., 12s. 6d.

This "book of reminiscences" is compiled from the many contributions of Mr. Russell to journals and magazines. It is, like all his writing, easy reading, and may well serve to interest the older reader especially, who may in years gone by have known the various persons named. We find in some of the later articles a fresh presentation of the author's special views on theology and the Church establishment.

Stillwell (A. E.). HOW TO REDUCE YOUR INCOME TAX BY LIBERTY CURRENCY. London, Hodder & Stoughton. 70 pp.

This booklet has been written to explain a scheme which should be regarded as preliminary to 'The Great Plan: How to Pay for the War,' by the same author. The Liberty Currency, he claims, "would lift nearly one-half of the war debts of Great Britain, and make a large reduction in all income taxes the first year of its adoption."

Barnard (H. C.), M.A., B.Litt. THE PORT-ROYALISTS ON EDUCATION. Cambridge, University Press. 276 pp., 7s. 6d. n.

The contribution which the Port-Royalists made to education and the significance of the Port-Royalist Movement—especially when we remember the emphasis which it laid on the development of character and the inspiration it drew from Descartes' teaching in regard to the importance of independent thought—render this book extremely valuable to teachers and others concerned with the training of the young. The general sketch of education in France in the seventeenth century is particularly interesting, and much information is given as to the methods of training followed at the Port Royal schools, in addition to extracts from the writings of Saint Cyran, Lancelot, Antoine Arnauld, Pascal, Mme. Guyot, Racine and others.

Christianity and Industrial Problems: being the Report of the Archbishops' Fifth Committee of Inquiry; Part I., with Bibliography. London, Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge. 147 pp., 1s.

That one should be able for the small sum of 1s. to obtain a Report so admirably written, so full of thought and so challenging to the Christian conscience as this is really remarkable, and it is clear proof, all that has been said to the contrary notwithstanding, that the Church is still alive. No one can complain that the Committee of Inquiry who have compiled it have not realised to the full the implications of Christ's teaching in regard to the danger of being pre-occupied with material ambitions or of having too much money, but the emphasis is rightly laid upon the permeation of society with the Christian spirit from which alone the best methods for its order or permanence must proceed.

George (Edward). FROM MILL-BOY TO MINISTER, the Life of the Right Hon. J. R. Clynes, M.P. London, T. Fisher Unwin. 119 pp., 3s. 6d. n.

One of those remarkable biographical records of human perseverance in the pursuit of knowledge and independence with which the history of democracy teems, but to which, presumably, very few additions will be made when every man has his chance and poverty is no more. Mr. Clynes has risen to a great and influential position, and he does not mind publicity being given to the fact that he got his start, intellectually, when, as a "piecer" at an Oldham mill, he managed at great personal sacrifice to buy a second-hand dictionary as he went home after his day's work.

WE are asked to state that, notwithstanding unauthorised reports which have appeared, the Joint War Committee of the British Red Cross Society and the Order of St. John will gratefully receive New Year collections made on behalf of their work for the needs of the sick and wounded, and more especially to the work of after-care and restorative treatment of wounded men.

HOMAGE to Lord Morley who on Christmas Eve attained his eightieth birthday. He has throughout his long career combined dutiful industry with great ability, and preserving his own independence as a thinker has consistently defended the rights of others. He merits the gratitude of all liberal minds.

"THERE is not enough living in the Churches to make a League between them practical politics at the present time." So writes the Rev. J. H. Weatherall in reply to an inquiry by The Christian Commonwealth, and he adds some candid criticisms, closing with the remark that "the laity must begin the reform, and can effect it by demanding a doctrine of a Loving God, a Human Christ, a Natural Church, and the Neighbourly Heart."

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Ballyclare.—A large congregation assembled on December 15 to welcome to his pulpit Lieut. P. Godding, pastor loci, who volunteered for military service last year, and in April crossed to France. He was taken prisoner, after a fierce engagement, and from the end of May till the armistice he has been at a prison camp near Rastatt, Baden, where he undertook duty as a chaplain to the evident gratification of his brother officers in the camp. He will shortly lecture on his experiences, and will contribute an article to The Non-Subscribing Presbyterian.

Belper.—On Wednesday, December 18, a cordial welcome was given to the new minister of the Unitarian Chapel, the Rev. J. A. Carrara Davies, at a meeting held in the schoolroom. In addition to the large gathering of the church members, there were also present Mr. J. Dungworth of the Sheffield and District Lay Preachers' Association, who had rendered such valuable help during the nine months in which the congregation has been without a minister and who presided on this occasion. The Rev.

Simon Jones, the newly-appointed minister of the High Pavement Church, Nottingham, and the Rev. W. E. George of Derby were also present. The resolution of welcome to the new minister was very appropriately moved by Mr. W. Jones, the Secretary of the congregation, seconded by Mr. W. Ryde, and supported by Mr. J. Dugdale. Speeches of welcome were also delivered by the Revs. Simon Jones and W. E. George, who had brought with them the greetings and good wishes of their respective churches; the North Midland Presbyterian and Unitarian Association; the Ministers of the district; Mr. John Loring; and Mr. R. Ling. The Rev. J. C. Carrara Davies in responding made an earnest appeal for encouragement and co-operation in all the various activities of the church life.

Bolton.—On Saturday and Sunday, December 14 and 15, the twenty-fifth anniversary of the opening of Unity Church was celebrated. The proceedings on Saturday opened with a reception of the congregation by the Rev. and Mrs. Edward Morgan, Mrs. Frank Taylor, Mrs. T. H. Lee, and Messrs. Lee and Lancaster. Nearly three hundred persons partook of tea and no charge was made for admission, the guests having been invited by the "Silver Jubilee Committee," but an envelope was supplied to each one present in which he or she might place a coin to represent every year he or she had lived. After tea Mr. J. B. Gass, J.P., took the chair and made a suitable speech, and an address was given by the Rev. J. Islan Jones, who spoke both on behalf of Hindley Presbyterian Chapel, of which he is the minister, and Halliwell Road Free Church, of which he was lately the minister. The Revs. J. Cyril Flower of Bank Street Chapel and A. O. Broadley of Halliwell Road were present during part of the time. Mr. J. Lancaster, one of the pioneers of the movement, presented a report and retrospect paying eloquent tribute to the memory of the many who had done such good work in the past. The Rev. H. M. Livens, minister from 1893 to 1900, in a long and most interesting address, voiced both the many happy memories of the past and the great possibilities and aspirations of the future. Other speakers were Mr. William Taylor, who has done yeoman service for both church and Sunday school; and the present minister, whose reception by the audience was a signal proof of the esteem in which he is held. In a characteristically cheery speech he urged all to co-operate in making the most of the great opportunities afforded by the coming of Peace. Musical items were contributed by Mrs. Blakley, Miss Hibbert, Mr. H. Fallows, and Miss Rosamund Taylor. On the following day the Rev. H. M. Livens preached in the morning and the Rev. J. J. Wright in the afternoon. The congregation rejoiced to see Mr. Wright looking quite well again, while his words of encouragement and hope were an inspiration to all present. The pulpit in the evening was occupied by the present minister, the Rev. E. Morgan. There were large congregations all day and it was announced that close upon £300 had been raised towards the fund for building a new church.

Chester.—Matthew Henry's Chapel has sustained the sad loss of four members of the congregation owing to the prevalent epidemic. Mr. H. Gladstone Boulton died after an illness of two days on Wednesday, October 30, aged 48 years. The funeral took place on Saturday, November 2, a devotional service being held in the Chapel previously, the Minister, the Rev. D. Jenkin Evans, officiating. Miss Elizabeth Boulton, Mr. H. G. Boulton's eldest daughter, had been ailing for a few days before her father's seizure, and passed away on November 8, in her 23rd year. The burial took place on November 12, in the New Cemetery after a service in the Chapel. The Minister was assisted at the graveside by the Rev. C. M. Wright, M.A., Precentor, Chester Cathedral. After an illness which extended over some days Mr. James Jelly died on November 4, aged 50 years, and after a week's illness Mr. Robert Andrews died at the Royal Infirmary from acute pneumonia, aged 34 years. A service was held in both cases at the chapel prior to interment. To the relatives and friends the sincerest sympathy is extended. On Sunday morning November 24, a joint Memorial Service was held.—On Temperance Sunday, Nov. 10, a Temperance Service was held in the school-room and an address given by Mr. J. A. Lawson of the City Road Wesleyan Church in the afternoon.—A new photograph, which is reproduced on the cover of the Calendar, of the historic pulpit, the Matthew Henry Window and tablet, has been taken by Mr. Mark Cook of the City Walls Studio, from whom copies can be obtained at a nominal charge.

Leytonstone.—The Sunday School in connection with the Leytonstone Free Church held its second annual "Toy Service" on Sunday morning week at Haydn House, Fairlop Road. The toys, which made a greater display even than last year, are again to be distributed among the ragged children of Hoxton who are to be given a tea and entertainment with a Christmas tree on January 2nd. The service was conducted by Mr. Lewis Burt, the Secretary of the Hoxton Market Mission. The service in the evening was to have been conducted by Miss Maud Burt, the Superintendent of the school and leader of the Guild, but owing to a family bereavement she was unable to do so, and Mr. J. W. Peterken conducted the service instead. The attendance at the two services totalled ninety. A concert service was later held at the Whipp's Cross Military Hospital. The Leytonstone Free Church will shortly remove to larger premises at Seaton House, 57 Fairlop Road.

London: University Hall.—The following announcement in regard to the Little Portland Street congregation, which will meet for the closing service at University Hall on Sunday, December 29, at 11.15 A.M., appears in the Calendar: It is with the greatest regret that it has been decided that the services at University Hall should be discontinued at the end of the year. The difficulty of carrying them on has gradually increased, and the number of active members of the congregation has been sadly reduced during the past two years by death, illness and the claims of military service and other work connected with the war. With the close of these services the history of the Little Portland Street congregation will come to an end. Its influence since Little Portland Street Chapel was opened in 1833 has been widely felt. Among those who have occupied the pulpit, either as regular ministers or as preachers for considerable periods, have been the Rev. Edward Tagart, Dr. Martineau, the Rev. Philip Wicksteed, the Rev. Stopford Brooke, the Rev. John Page Hopps, and, since the migration to University Hall, Dr. John Hunter. Space does not allow of any attempt to enumerate the numbers of distinguished men and women who have been members of the congregation or regular attendants at the services. The fact that among them have been Charles Dickens, Crabb Robinson, Charles Darwin, Lord John Russell, Sir Charles Lyell, the geologist, and Miss Frances Power Cobbe, to name a few, is a sufficient indication that the congregation has a great tradition behind it. It had been hoped that, while the services were continued at University Hall, a central chapel, in which the Liberal Christianity of Unitarianism might be preached, could have been established. The paralysing effect of the war, however, and the prohibition of all building, finally defeated the congregation's efforts in this direction. They trust, however, that the idea of such a place of worship will not be allowed to be extinguished, and that, in the near future, another attempt will be made to meet what, they are convinced, is an urgent need.

Manchester: Moss Side.—Miss B. Thomas, daughter of the late Rev. E. L. N. Thomas, was the preacher, morning and evening, at the Unitarian Church on Sunday, December 1.—The Calendar records the death of three members of the church who have given their lives for liberty and justice: Sergeant P. Taylor Robinson, A.B., E. J. Bradford, R.N.D., and Private Arthur Ramage.

Wakefield.—The Westgate Unitarian Church Calendar announces that Mr. Lockwood is shortly to receive the Military Cross won by his son, 2nd Lieut. George Lockwood, K.O.Y.L.I., who died a year ago from wounds. In a letter from his company commander at that time it was stated that Lieut. Lockwood, who was wounded when going to the rescue of two of his men who had been "sniped," had been recommended for the M.C.

Wallasey.—The Rev. A. Ernest Parry has been Acting Librarian during the greater part of the war, and his services in that capacity have been greatly appreciated by the local authorities and the community. At the Annual Congregational Soirée in connection with the Memorial Church in November, Mr. Parry presented a copy of the "Breeches" Bible, which was in his possession, and which he desired should be regarded as his thank-offering to the church on the termination of the war and also as a memorial of his elder son who was killed in France on his 21st birthday, July 14, 1916. This Bible, which was published in 1599, is in wonderfully good condition, and contains a large number of quaint and interesting plans, maps, and drawings. It was gratefully accepted by Mr. Mann, the Chairman, on behalf of the congregation.

Wimbledon.—On December 17 the senior scholars of King's College School, Wimbledon Common, made a presentation to their Art Master, Mr. A. J. Howard Hulme, on the occasion of his leaving. As a lay preacher Mr. Hulme is known amongst London Unitarians, and he is, we believe, now preparing for the Unitarian ministry. The present consisted of an artistic illuminated address with hundreds of signatures, and four works of Dr. Martineau: 'Types of Ethical Theory' (2 vols.) and 'A Study of Religion' (2 vols.). Three other presentations to him also took place.

BIRTH.

HARRISON.—On the 19th December, to Kathleen, wife of Harold Harrison, 29 Streatham High Road, S.W.—a son.

MARRIAGES.

MAW—PAYNE.—On Christmas Day, at the New Meeting House, Kidderminster, by the Rev. J. E. Stronge, Rev. John W. Maw, M.A., of Dewsbury, to E. Jevons (Lucy) Payne, only daughter of Mr. and Mrs. W. Payne, Kidderminster.

WATTERSON—CLARK.—December 21st, at the Memorial Church, Liscard, Wallasey, by the Rev. A. Ernest Parry, John Herbert Watterson, of Liscard, to Josephine McKean Clark, elder daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Frank Clark, of 35 Mill Lane, Liscard, Wallasey, and granddaughter of the late Rev. Henry McKean, of Oldbury, near Birmingham.

DEATH.

WARREN.—Captain (Acting-Major) J. C. Warren, M.C., of Nottingham, missing March 21st, now reported killed in action near Bullecourt on that day.

Character-Building Thought Power.

Paper, 9d. net.

In 'Character-Building Thought Power,' Mr. Trine demonstrates the power of mental habits, and shows how by daily effort we may train ourselves into right ways of thinking and acting.

'In Tune with the Infinite' is the most important of Mr. Trine's books. Its object, in the author's own words, is "to point out the great facts and laws underlying the workings of the interior, spiritual, thought forces, to point them out so simply and so clearly that all can grasp them, that all can take them and infuse them into everyday life, so as to mould it in all its details in accordance with what they would have it, is the author's purpose.
